HOW TO USE THIS GUIDE

This guide will help you to get the most from your visit to Moscow. It provides expert recommendations together with detailed practical information. Introducing Moscow maps the city and sets it in its geographical, historical and cultural context, and the quick-reference timeline on the history pages gives the dates of Russia's rulers and significant events. Moscow at a Glance is an overview of the city's main attractions. Moscow Area by Area starts on page 50 and describes all the important sights, using maps, photographs and illustrations. The sights are arranged in three groups: those in Moscow's central districts, those a little further afield, and finally those beyond Moscow which require one- or two-day excursions. Hotel, restaurant and entertainment recommendations can be found in Travellers' Needs, while the Survival Guide includes tips on everything from transport and telephones to personal safety.

Neo-Classical statue, Kuskovo, (see pp142–3)

FINDING YOUR WAY AROUND THE SIGHTSEEING SECTION

Each of the seven sightseeing areas is colour-coded for easy reference. Every chapter opens with an introduction to the area it covers, describing its history and character. For central districts, this is followed by a Street-by-Street map illustrating a particularly interesting part of the area; for sights further away, by a regional map. A simple numbering system relates sights to the maps. Important sights are covered by several pages.

The area shaded in pink is shown in greater detail on the Street-by-Street map.

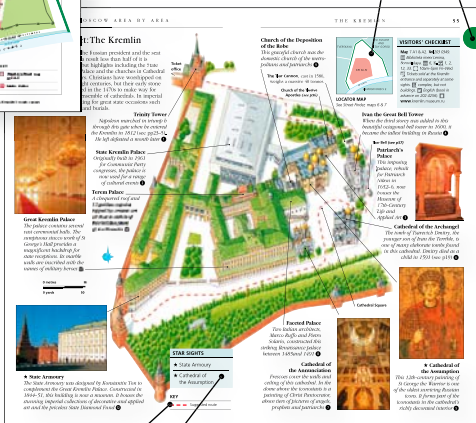

2 Street-by-Street Map
This gives a bird's eye view of interesting and important parts of each sightseeing area, with accurate drawings of all the buildings within them. The numbering of the sights ties in with the preceding area map and with the fuller descriptions on the pages that follow.

1 Introduction to the Area
For easy reference, the sights are numbered and plotted on an area map, with metro stations shown where helpful. The key sights (great buildings, museums and open-air sights) are listed by category.

A locator map shows where you are in relation to other areas of the city centre.

Colour-coded thumb tabs mark each area.

Suggested walking route

A list of star sights recommends the places that no visitor should miss.

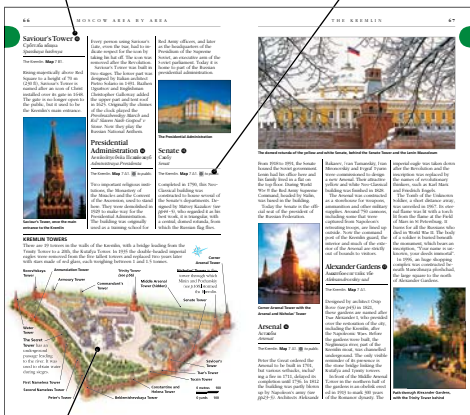

MOSCOW AREA MAP

The coloured areas shown on this map (see pp14–15) are the five main sightseeing areas into which central Moscow can be divided for this guide. Each is covered in a full chapter in the Moscow Area by Area section (pp50–125). The areas are also highlighted on other maps throughout the book. In Moscow at a Glance (pp36–49), for example, they help you locate the most important sights that no visitor should miss. The maps' coloured borders match the coloured thumb tabs at the top corner of each page.

Numbers refer to each sight's position on the area map and its place in the chapter.

Practical information lists all the information you need to visit every sight, including a map reference to the Street Finder maps (pp220–37)

Illustrated maps show in detail the layout of extensive sights.

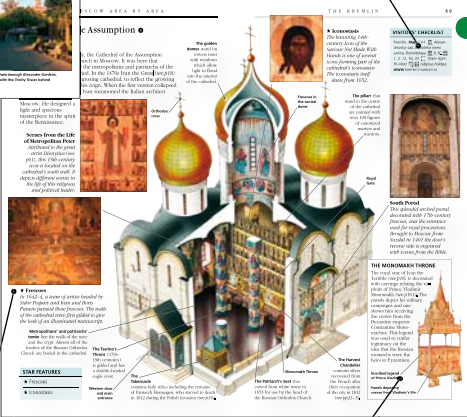

4 Moscow's Major Sights
These are given more extensive coverage, sometimes two or more full pages. Historic buildings are dissected to reveal their interiors; museums and galleries have colour-coded floorplans to help you find important exhibits.

Stars indicate the best features or works of art.

3 Detailed information on each sight

All the important sights are described individually. They are listed to follow the numbering on the area map at the start of the section. The key to the symbols summarizing practical information is on the back flap.

A visitors' checklist provides the practical information you will need to plan your visit.

Story boxes provide details on famous people or historical events.

FOUR GREAT DAYS IN MOSCOW

The Russian capital, having endured wars, revolutions and drastic social change, is today a place where the past and present combine to captivate and charm. From the multi-coloured onion domes of churches to the graves of Soviet heroes, reminders of the city's past are on almost every corner. Galleries like the Tretyakov are treasure troves of art, while the State Armoury contains treasure pure and simple, from Fabergé eggs to diamonds galore. A city of around 10 million, Moscow may seem daunting at first, but these itineraries will help you find your way around it all. The price guide includes the cost of food and admission fees.

MOSCOW'S PAST

- First stop Red Square
- Heroes and villains
- Colourful domes of St Basil's Cathedral
- Inside the Kremlin

TWO ADULTS allow at least $140

Morning

A whistle-stop tour through Russian history begins with a stroll across Red Square (see p106), a vast expanse that accommodated huge military parades during the Soviet era. From here, head into Lenin's Mausoleum (see p107) to pay your respects to the leader of Russia's historic 1917 revolution. Afterwards, follow the path to the Kremlin Walls, to see the graves of other well-known Soviets including the ruthless dictator Joseph Stalin, and Yuriy Gagarin, the first man to orbit the planet. From the Kremlin Walls, make your way to St Basil's Cathedral (see pp108–9), one of Russia's enduring symbols. According to legend, Ivan the Terrible had the cathedral's architect blinded to ensure that he would never again create anything to rival its beauty.

Afternoon

Feeling peckish? Make your way to Kamergerskiy pereulok, just off Tverskaya ulitsa (see p89). This pleasant, traffic-free zone is in one of the city's main shopping districts and has a good choice of restaurants and cafés offering flavours from all over the world.

Afterwards, you can visit the Kremlin itself (see pp53–67). Long the seat of power in Russia, the complex of cathedrals and palaces was not open to the public until the death of Stalin in 1955. Tickets are sold for separate sights, but be sure not to miss the collection of royal treasures at the State Armoury (see pp64–5) or icons and gilded frescoes at the Cathedral of the Assumption (see pp58–9). Make time, too, for Ivan the Great's Bell Tower (see p57). The 200-tonne behemoth of a bell outside the tower is the largest in the world.

ART & ARCHITECTURE

- Treasures of Tretyakov
- Lunch in the park
- Exploring Old Arbat

TWO ADULTS allow at least $150

Morning

Start the day with a visit to the world-class Tretyakov Gallery (see pp118–21). The priceless collection of Russian art includes the 15th-century Trinity icon by Historic Red Square, with the distinctive onion domes of St Basil's Cathedral in the distance

Riverboat on the Moskva river, passing by the Kremlin

Andrey Rublev and The Appearance of Christ to the People, a colossal work that took artist Aleksandr Ivanov 20 years to paint. The gift shop is a good place to stock up on souvenirs.

For a bite to eat, take a wander through leafy Alexander Gardens (see p67), which has a good choice of cafés including pizzerias and an English-style pub.

Afternoon

Suitably refreshed, head for Old Arbat (see pp70–71). Once the favoured haunt of writers, artists and poets, this lively pedestrianized area is a good place to seek out mementoes of the Soviet era, such as flags, statuettes and old bits of Red Army kit, from the many stalls and shops that line the streets. There are also a few shops specializing in traditional icons.

The area has some fine examples of Russian architecture including the 19th-century Pushkin House-Museum (see p73), which gives visitors a good idea of what life in Moscow was like when this literary giant lived here. Afterwards, take a detour down Krivoarbatskiy pereulok for the Melnikov House (see p72), a cylindrical building designed in the 1920s by Konstantin Melnikov, one of Russia's greatest Constructivist architects. For a late dinner, try Restaurant Rus (see p184), on Old Arbat, for pancakes, caviar and perhaps a glass or two of vodka.

HISTORY & FRESH AIR

- A fortified convent
- Famous graves
- A trip to the country

TWO ADULTS allow at least $80

Morning

Hop on the metro for Novodevichiy Convent (see pp130–31), where you can soak up some of the 16th-century atmosphere of this fortified religious complex. Novodevichiy's nearby cemetery reads like a Who's Who of Russian history and contains the graves of literary luminary Anton Chekhov and political heavyweight Nikita Khrushchev.

Afternoon

Afterwards, take the metro to Kolomenskoe (see pp138–9), a country estate much loved by the tsars that is now a museum of architecture. Enjoy a lunch of traditional Russian food in one of the small wooden buildings. Highlights include the 16th-century Church of the Ascension and a log cabin built for Peter the Great. The park is also a wonderful place for a walk along the Moskva river, especially in winter when it often freezes over.

A FAMILY DAY

- A gentle river cruise
- Exploring Gorky Park
- The magical circus

FAMILY OF 4 allow at least $125

Morning

In summer there is nothing more pleasant than taking a Moscow River Cruise (see p221). Winding through the heart of the city, the double-decker river boats pass several of the major sights including the Kremlin and the Cathedral of Christ the Redeemer. Jump ship at Gorky Park (see p129), where the many attractions include fairground rides, ice skating (in winter), boating lakes and the Buran Shuttle, a flight simulator that offers the chance for would-be cosmonauts to hurtle into orbit. Safely back on terra firma, the park is a good picnic spot.

Afternoon

Later, head off to the Old Circus (see p198) for a breathtaking display by world-renowned acrobats and trapeze artists. The antics of the circus's performing bears and tigers are not to everyone's taste, however. The colourful marionettes of the Moscow Puppet Theatre (see p191) are a worthwhile alternative.

Putting Moscow on the Map

The Russian Federation (usually simply known as Russia) stretches from the Baltic to the Pacific. With an area of 17 million sq km (6.6 million sq miles), it was the largest of the USSR's 15 republics and is now the world's largest country, almost twice the size of the US. Moscow, the capital with 9 million inhabitants, lies at the heart of European Russia. St Petersburg is Russia's second largest city. Russia is a member of the CIS – a commonwealth of most of the former Soviet republics.

An infrared satellite image of Moscow

Central Moscow

Most of Moscow's sights are situated in the city centre, within the area bounded by the Garden Ring and the Boulevard Ring. In this book the centre has been divided into five sightseeing areas, while two further sections cover the outskirts and day trips into the countryside. Each of the central areas has a distinctive character, with the sights in each one lying within easy walking distance of one another. All of these sights are also well served by public transport.

Hotel National

Located in the heart of Tverskaya, close to the Bolshoy Theatre (see pp90–91), the National (see p89) is an eclectic mixture of Style Moderne and Classical style.

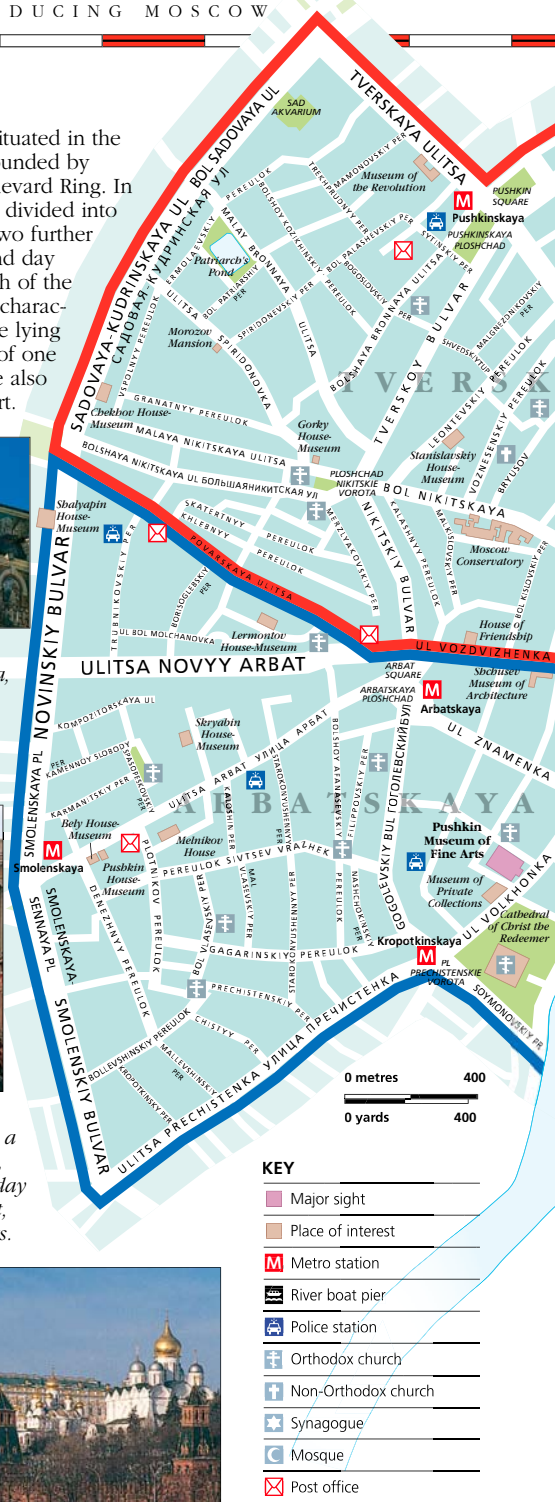

Ulitsa Arbat

Running the length of what was a suburb in 15th-century Moscow, ulitsa Arbat (see pp70–71) is today a crowded, pedestrianized street, lined with shops and restaurants.

The Kremlin

The heart of the city, the Kremlin (see pp52–67) has dominated Russian life for over 800 years. Its buildings are from the 15th–20th centuries.

Tretyakov Gallery
 Across the river from Moscow's other main sights, the Tretyakov Gallery (see pp118–21) houses a vast collection of Russian art.

St Basil's Cathedral
 Located in Red Square (see p106), west of the historic district of Kitay Gorod, St Basil's (see pp108–9) is probably Russia's most enduring image.

THE HISTORY OF MOSCOW

From her 12th-century origins as an obscure defensive outpost, Moscow came to govern one sixth of the earth's surface and cast her shadow even further. The story of her rise is laced with glory and setbacks, including the two centuries when St Petersburg was the capital of Russia and Moscow lived the life of a dignified dowager.

THE FIRST SETTLERS

The forested area around Moscow was sparsely populated, but the fertile lands of southern Russia and the Ukraine had long supported trade routes between the Orient and Europe. It was here that the Slavs, the ancestors of the Russian people, first settled. They came from Eastern Europe in the 6th century, and established isolated villages along the major rivers. In the 8th century they came into contact with the Varangians (Vikings), who navigated these waterways to trade amber, furs and fair-skinned slaves.

KIEVAN RUS

Endemic in-fighting between the Slavic tribes was quelled when Rurik, a Varangian chief,

Vladimir's conversion in the Baptism of Russia by Vasnetsov assumed power in the region. Rurik settled in Novgorod, but his successor Oleg took Kiev and made it his capital. In 988 Grand Prince Vladimir I, a descendant of Rurik, was baptised into Orthodox Christianity (see p137) and married the sister of the Byzantine emperor. Vladimir's conversion deeply affected the future of Russia, which remained an Orthodox country right into the 20th century.

THE MONGOL INVASION

By the 12th century, Kiev's supremacy had already been challenged by the powerful Russian principalities to the north, including Rostov-Suzdal (see p161), of which the wooden kremlin at Moscow formed part. As a result, when the fierce horse-borne Mongols invaded in 1237, the disunited Russians fell easy victims to the well-organized troops of Batu Khan. For the next 240 years the Russian principalities paid an exorbitant yearly tribute to the khans, though they were left to govern themselves.

THE RISE OF MOSCOW

In the 14th century, the Mongols chose Moscow's power-hungry Grand Prince Ivan I, "Kalita" or "Moneybags" (1325–40), to collect tribute from all their conquered principalities, giving the city supremacy over its neighbours. Ivan had already shown his obsequiousness by crushing a revolt against the Mongols led by his neighbour, the Grand Prince of Tver. Yet the Mongols were sealing their own fate, for, as Moscow flourished under their benevolence, she ultimately became a real threat to their power.

Within 50 years an army of soldiers from several Russian principalities, led by Moscow's Grand Prince Dmitriy Donskoy (1359–89), inflicted their first defeat on the Mongols, and the idea of a Russian nation was born.

It was not until the reign of Ivan III, "the Great" (1462–1505), when Moscow ruled a kingdom which stretched as far as the Arctic Ocean and the Urals, that the Mongols were finally vanquished. Ivan married the niece of the last emperor of Byzantium, who had fled Constantinople when it had fallen to the Ottomans in 1453. This increased Moscow's prestige further, and particularly her claim to being the last defender of true Orthodoxy. Ivan also sought to assert Moscow's status through a grand building programme. He started the tradition of importing foreign architects, including the Italians (see p44) who built the present Kremlin walls.

IVAN THE TERRIBLE

It was Ivan the Great's grandson, Ivan IV, "the Terrible" (1533–84), who transformed himself from Grand Prince of Moscow to "Tsar of All the Russias". During his reign Russia expanded beyond the Urals into Siberia and strong trading links were established with England. Moscow's walls were strengthened for, even as late as 1571, the Crimean Mongols continued to venture sporadic attacks on the Russian capital.

Yet, powerful though he was, Ivan suffered dreadful paranoia. After the death of his beloved wife Anastasia, he became convinced that she had been poisoned by the boyars (see p20) and set up Russia's first police state. A sinister force of black-hooded agents called the oprichniki murdered whole villages to stamp out the tsar's supposed enemies. Ivan also imposed restrictions on the aristocracy and peasantry alike, establishing those autocratic traditions that were to prove the country's downfall. Ivan's more immediate legacy was his contribution to the end of the Varangian dynasty, the murder of his only competent son, also named Ivan, in a paranoid rage.

THE TIME OF TROUBLES

This ushered in a period known as the Time of Troubles. For fourteen years, Ivan's retarded son Fyodor (1584–98) ruled under the guidance of Boris Godunov, a former and much-hated oprichnik. When Fyodor died childless, Godunov installed himself in the Kremlin, but he soon became target of a pretender to the throne. The pretender claimed to be Ivan the Terrible's dead youngest son Dimitry, sought support from Poland and marched on Moscow with an army of 4,000 in 1604. With the death of Boris Godunov in 1605 he was installed on the throne. The pretender was soon to enrage the Moscow boyars, who killed him, and replaced him with Vasilii Shuiskiy, a boyar of some distinction. Faced with a second "False Dmitry" marching on Moscow in 1607, Shuiskiy appealed to Sweden for help only to provoke a new Polish intervention. The Poles reached Moscow in 1610 and Shuiskiy was then deposed by the boyars. In the north, the Swedes used the internal instability of Russia to capture Novgorod. Only in these desperate circumstances did the Russians finally unite to expel the occupying Poles, under the leadership of Minin and Prince Pozharskiy (see p108). The siege of the Kremlin thus ended in 1612.

THE FIRST ROMANOV

Determined to put an end to this period of anarchy, Moscow's leading citizens came together to nominate the 16-year old Mikhail Romanov, great-nephew of Ivan's first wife Anastasia, as hereditary tsar, thus initiating the 300-year rule of the Romanovs. Under Mikhail (1613–45), who ruled with his father Filaret, the patriarch of Moscow, Russia recovered from her exhausting upheavals. His greatest legacy, however, was his heir Alexis (1645–76).

An intelligent and pious man, Alexis tried to modernize the state. He oversaw the first codification of Russian law and encouraged an influx of foreign technicians, against the will of the Church. During the reign of Alexis the Church saw difficult times due to the schism between the reformers, led by Patriarch Nikon (see p57), and the conservative Old Believers. Nikon, however, grew too important for his own good which resulted in Alexis asserting the power of the State over the Church.

Medieval Moscow

Moscow developed in 400 years from an isolated wooden fortress (kremlin), built in 1156, into a thriving capital city, "shining like Jerusalem from without, but like Bethlehem inside". Its circle of outer walls enclosed a series of smaller districts centred on the Kremlin, whose wooden stockade was replaced with white limestone in 1367 to protect the city from Mongol raids, and by massive brick walls in 1495. It boasted a clutch of stone cathedrals, befitting its role as the "Third Rome" after the fall of Constantinople in 1453. Next to the Kremlin lay Red Square, where public spectacles ranged from executions to fairs. The rest of the city housed boyars, merchants, servants, hawkers and artisans.

EXTENT OF THE CITY

Andrey Rublev (c.1370–1430)

Moscow's finest icon painter, Andrey Rublev is seen here painting a fresco at the Monastery of the Saviour and Andronicus (see p140). Icons (see p61) were used for the religious education of the people.

A Silver Kovsh

Originally made in wood, this ceremonial drinking vessel, known as a kovsh, began to be crafted in metal in the 14th century. Elaborately decorated kovshi were often given by the tsar to favoured subjects. These treasured artifacts would be displayed as a symbol of wealth when not in use.

Boyars and Merchants

Though richly dressed, boyars (noblemen) in medieval Russia were largely illiterate and often crude in their habits.

Their material needs were looked after by merchants who traded in furs from the north and silk from Turkey.

THE WALLED CITY

Vasnetsov's (see p144) painting of the Kremlin in the 15th century shows the warren of wooden houses which surrounded the palaces and churches. Among them were the renowned Kremlin workshops.

Foreigners in Moscow

From the 16th century, foreign diplomats and traders began to visit the isolated and xenophobic Russia. The adventurer Richard Chancellor, who attempted to find the northwest passage to the Orient but ended up in Russia, managed to negotiate a trading treaty with Ivan the Terrible.

WHERE TO SEE
MEDIEVAL MOSCOW

The Kremlin's medieval buildings include its Cathedrals of the Assumption (see pp58–9), the Archangel (p60) and the Annunciation (p60). The State Armoury (pp64–5), also in the Kremlin, displays medieval artifacts and armour while the daily life of the nobility is recreated in the Palace of the Romanov Boyars (pp102–3). St Basil's Cathedral (pp108–9) also dates from this time.

Wooden houses could be bought pre-fabricated from a market outside the city walls. They quickly replaced houses that were lost in Moscow's frequent fires.

Cathedral of the Assumption

Small trading vessels thronged the banks of the Moskva river, unloading goods for the growing city. Russia's rivers were her trading routes and were far more efficient than travel by land.

Ivan the Terrible

Though Ivan IV's reign (1533–84) did much to benefit Russia, he certainly deserved his epithet. Among the many souls on his conscience was his only worthy son and heir, Ivan, killed in a fit of rage which the tsar regretted for the rest of his life.

Building a Cathedral

During the reign of Ivan I (1325–40), when the first stone Cathedral of the Assumption was built, Metropolitan Peter moved to Moscow to be head of the Orthodox Church. This manuscript illustration shows him blessing the new cathedral.

PETER THE GREAT

The extraordinary reign of Alexis's son Peter I, "the Great", really put Russia back on her feet. Brought up in an atmosphere of reform, Peter was determined to make Russia a modern European state. In 1697, he became the first tsar ever to go abroad, with the particular aim of studying shipbuilding and other European technologies. On his return, he began immediately to build a Russian navy, reformed the army and insisted on Western-style clothing for his courtiers. At Poltava in 1709, Peter dramatically defeated the Swedes, who had been a threat to Russia for a century, and stunned Europe into taking note of an emerging power.

Peter's effect on Moscow was double-edged. At the age of ten he had seen relatives murdered in the Kremlin during the Streltsy Rebellion. This revolt had sprung from rivalry between his mother's family, the Naryshkins, and that of his father's first wife, the Miloslavskiys, over the succession. In the end Peter was made co-tsar with his half-brother Ivan, but developed a pathological distrust of Moscow. He took a long-awaited and grim revenge on the Streltys 16 years

Tsarina Elizabeth (1741-62)

In 1712 he declared the cold, damp St Petersburg capital of Russia. For the next 200 years Moscow was Russia's second city.

THE PETTICOAT PERIOD

After Peter the Great's death in 1725, Russia was ruled by women for most of the 18th century: Catherine I, Anna, Elizabeth and Catherine II. Though they were all crowned in the Cathedral of the Assumption (see pp58-9), most preferred to live in Europeanized St Petersburg. However, Elizabeth, Peter's boisterous, fun-loving daughter, insisted on living in Moscow periodically. During Peter's reign constructions in stone outside St Petersburg had been banned, but under Elizabeth a flurry of new buildings appeared in Moscow, especially since some of Russia's leading families preferred to live there.

Elizabeth founded Russia's first university in Moscow (see p94), under the guidance of Russia's 18th-century Renaissance man, the poet, scientist and academic Mikhail Lomonosov. But Moscow was still protected from the Westernization affecting the capital and thus retained a more purely Russian soul and identity.

CATHERINE THE GREAT

In 1762 Catherine II, "the Great", a German princess, usurped the throne of her feeble husband Peter III with the help of her lover Grigoriy Orlov, a guards officer. Under her energetic, intelligent leadership, the country saw another vast expansion in its prestige and made territorial gains at the expense of Turkey and its old adversary Poland. Catherine purchased great collections of European art and books (including Voltaire's library) and in 1767 published her Nakaz (Imperial Instruction) upon which a reform of Russia's legal system was to be based. Unsurprisingly, this modern European monarch regarded Moscow as inward-looking and backward and spent little time there.

lectual plan. The Napoleonic Wars also marked a turning point in Russian political history, as soldiers returned from Europe bringing with them the seeds of liberal ideas. Far from the court of Nicholas I, the Iron Tsar, Moscow became a fertile environment for underground debate among early revolutionaries such as Herzen and the Decembrists. Yet most of Moscow society was trapped in a comfortable and conservative cocoon, financed by the system of serfdom. With the Emancipation of the Serfs in 1861, however, the economic strength of most nobles was radically curtailed. The freed serfs who were too poor to buy their own land, flocked to the factories of mercantile and industrial entrepreneurs. In Moscow, at the old heart of the empire, these entrepreneurs came to usurp the position of the aristocrats, making vast fortunes from trade, textiles, railways, banking and publishing, and financing a renaissance in the Russian arts on the proceeds.

19TH-CENTURY MOSCOW

Napoleon's invasion in 1812 and the heroic part played in his defeat by Moscow (see pp24-5) appeared to reinvigorate the city. Aleksandr Herzen (see p71) claimed that "Moscow was again made the 'capital' of the Russian people by Napoleon", and, indeed, the destruction of two thirds of the city by fire resulted in a bold new archi-

War and Peace

Russia's glorious rise to the ranks of a world power accelerated in the period between 1800 and 1830. Even though she suffered severe defeats against France, including the Battle of Austerlitz (1805), and signed the Treaty of Tilsit in 1807. The uneasy peace ended in 1812, with the invasion of Napoleon's Grande Armée. But Russia turned disaster into victory and in 1814–15, Tsar Alexander I sat down to decide Europe's future at the Congress of Vienna. The war marked an important cultural shift in Russia as liberal Western European political ideas first filtered into the country, although their time had not yet come.

Alexander I (1801–25)

The handsome young tsar was initially infected by the ideals of enlightened government, but became increasingly influenced by his reactionary advisers.

Napoleon stayed in the tsar's apartments for a few days before retreating to safety outside the city.

MOSCOW BURNING

After Field Marshal Mikhail Kutuzov's retreat at Borodino, the French army was able to enter Moscow. But Muscovites set light to their city and fled. In just four days, two thirds of the city burnt down, leaving the army without shelter or provisions. Combined with Alexander I's refusal to negotiate while Napoleon remained on Russian territory, this resulted in the French emperor's defeat.

Battle of Borodino, September 1812

The Battle of Borodino (see p158) lasted 15 hours, causing the death of 70,000 men, half of them French. Yet Napoleon declared the battle a victory and advanced on Moscow.

Facing the winter without supplies, the army began its retreat in October. Only 30,000 out of 600,000 men made it back.

Empire Style

Many things, from chairs to plates, were designed in the popular Empire style (see p45). This cup and saucer with a Classical motif were made at the Popov factory near Moscow in 1810.

WHERE TO SEE NEO-CLASSICAL MOSCOW

Early examples of Neo-Classicism can be seen at the palaces of Ostankino (see p144) and Kuskovo (pp142–3), at Pashkov House (p75) and at Moscow Old University (p94). The fire of 1812 allowed vast areas to be developed to an Empire-style city plan. Bolshaya Nikitskaya ulitsa (p93), ulitsa Prechistenka (p74) and Theatre Square (p88) are lined with fine buildings from this time.

Pediment, Kuskovo Palace

Moscow University

It was after the Napoleonic Wars that the University of Moscow, founded in 1755, gained a reputation as a hotbed of liberalism. However, political discussions still had to be conducted at secret salons.

Alexander Pushkin

The great Romantic poet Alexander Pushkin (see p73) captured the spirit of the time. Pushkin and his wife Natalya were often invited to court balls, such as the one shown here. This enabled Nicholas I to keep an eye on the liberal poet as well as on his enchanting wife.

New fires were started deliberately throughout the city, on the orders of the tsarist governor.

The Millstone of Serfdom

In the shadow of the nobility's easy life, and to a great extent enabling it, were millions of serfs toiling in slavery on large estates. This painting shows a serf owner settling his debts by selling a girl to a new master.

THE END OF AN EMPIRE

Though the 1890s saw rapid advances in industrialization, Russia experienced a disastrous slump at the turn of the 20th century. Nicholas II's diversionary war with Japan backfired, causing economic unrest, adding to the misery of the working classes and finally culminating in the 1905 Revolution. On 9th January 1905, a demonstration in St Petersburg carried a petition of grievances to the tsar and was met by bullets. News of this "Bloody Sunday" spread like wildfire and strikes broke out all over the country. To avert further disaster Nicholas had to promise basic civil rights, and an elected parliament which he, however, simply dissolved whenever it displeased him. This high-handed behaviour, along with the imperial family's friendship with the "holy man" Rasputin, further damaged the Romanovs' reputation.

The outbreak of World War I brought a surge of patriotism which the inexperienced Nicholas sought to ride by taking personal command of the troops.

The Bolshevik by Boris Kustodiev, painted in 1920

By late 1916, however, Russia had lost 3,500,000 men, morale at the front was very low and supplies of food at home had become increasingly scarce.

REVOLUTION AND CIVIL WAR

In early 1917 strikes broke out in St Petersburg. People took to the streets, jails were stormed and the February Revolution began. The tsar was forced to abdicate and his family was placed under house arrest. Exiled revolutionaries flooded back into the country to set up workers' and soldiers' soviets. Elected by the workers as an alternative to an unelected provisional government they formed a powerful anti-war lobby. In October the leadership of the Bolsheviks, urged on by Lenin, decided on an armed uprising, under the rallying cries of "All power to the soviets!" and "Peace, bread and land". In the early hours of 26th October, they arrested the provisional government in St Petersburg's Winter Palace.

Within months the Bolsheviks had shown themselves as careless of democracy as the tsar, dismissing the constituent assembly and setting up their own secret police, the Cheka.

In March 1918, however, they stayed true to their promise and took Russia out of World War I, instead plunging the soldiers straight into a vicious civil war. The capital was moved back to Moscow, and from here Lenin and his government directed their “Red” army against the diverse coalition of anti-revolutionary groups known as the “Whites”. When White soldiers got closer to the exiled Romanovs in Yekaterinburg in July 1918, the royal family was brutally butchered by its captors. But the Whites were a disparate force, and by November 1920 Soviet Russia was rid of them, only to face two years of appalling famine.

THE STALIN YEARS

In the five years after Lenin’s death in 1924, Joseph Stalin used his position as General Secretary of the Communist Party to remove rivals such as Leon Trotsky and establish his dictatorship.

The terror began in the countryside, with the collectivization of agriculture which forced the peasantry to give up their land, machinery and livestock to collective farms in return for a salary. During this time, and in the ensuing famine of 1931–2, up to 10 million people are thought to have died.

The first major purge of intellectuals took place in urban areas in 1928–9. Then, in December 1934, Sergey Kirov, the local party leader in Leningrad, was assassinated on the secret orders of Stalin, although the murder was blamed on an underground anti-Stalinist cell. This was the catalyst for five years of purges, by the end of which over a million people had been executed and some 15 million arrested and sent to labour camps, where they often died.

In his purge of the Red Army in 1937–8, Stalin dismissed or executed three quarters of his officers. When the Germans invaded in 1941 they were able to advance rapidly, subjecting Leningrad to a horrendous siege of nearly 900 days. But Moscow was never taken since Hitler, like Napoleon before him, underestimated both the harshness of the Russian winter and his enemies’ willingness to fight.

After the German defeat, the Russian people, who had lost over 20 million souls in the war, were subjected to a renewed internal terror by Stalin, which lasted until his death in 1953.

The Russian Revolution

The Russian Revolution, which began in St Petersburg and made Moscow once more a capital city, was pivotal to the history of the 20th century. By late 1916, with Russia facing defeat in World War I and starvation at home, even ministers and generals were doubting the tsar's ability to rule. In 1917 there were two uprisings, the February Revolution which began with massive strikes and led to the abdication of Nicholas II, and the October Revolution which overturned the provisional government and swept the Communists to power. They emerged victoriously from the Civil War that followed, to attempt to build a new society.

Nicholas II, seen here clearing snow during his house arrest outside St Petersburg, was later taken with his family to Yekaterinburg in the Urals. There, in 1918, they were shot and their bodies thrown down a mine shaft.

REDS OUTSIDE THE KREMLIN

In October, the fight for control of the Kremlin was intense in comparison to the one in St Petersburg. The Bolshevik seizure was reversed after three days, and it took the revolutionaries another six days to overcome loyalist troops in the fortress and elsewhere in the city.

A charismatic speaker, depicted here by Viktor Ivanov, the exiled Lenin returned in April to lead the Revolution. By late 1917 his Bolshevik party had gained power.

Women took part in demonstrations and strikes.

Revolutionary Plate

Ceramics with revolutionary themes, mixed with touches of Russian folklore, were produced to commemorate special events. This plate marks the founding of the Third International Communist group in 1919.

Leon Trotsky

The intellectual Trotsky played a leading military role in the Revolution. In 1928, during the power struggle after Lenin's death, he was exiled by Stalin. He was murdered in Mexico, in 1940, by a Stalinist agent.

Propaganda

One hallmark of the Soviet regime was its powerful propaganda. Many talented artists were employed to design posters, which spread the Socialist message through striking graphics. During the Civil War (1918–20), posters such as this one extolled the “pacifist army of workers” to support War Communism.

Banner proclaiming freedom to the world

Avant-Garde Art

Even before 1917, Russia's artists had been in a state of revolution, producing the world's first truly abstract paintings. A fine example of avant-garde art is Supremus No. 56, painted in 1916 by Kazimir Malevich.

Old and young were swept away by the revolutionary fervour.

New Values

Traditions were radically altered by the Revolution; instead of church weddings, couples exchanged vows under the red flag. Loudly trumpeted sexual equality meant that women had to work twice as hard – at home and in the factories.

The Washington Dove of Peace (1953), a Russian caricature from the days of the Cold War

BEHIND THE IRON CURTAIN

Three years after Stalin's death his successor, Nikita Khrushchev, denounced his crimes at the 20th Party Congress and the period known as "The Thaw" began. Thousands of political prisoners were released and books critical of Stalin were published. In foreign affairs, things were not so liberal. Soviet tanks invaded Hungary in 1956 and in 1962 Khrushchev's decision to base nuclear missiles on Cuba brought the world to the brink of nuclear war.

FIRST IN SPACE

Sputnik 2 and the space dog Laika, 1957

Under Khrushchev the Soviet Union achieved her greatest coup against the West, when she sent Sputnik 1 into space in 1957. That same year the dog Laika was the first living creature in space, on Sputnik 2. She never came back but, four years later, Yuriy Gagarin made history as the first man in space, returning as a hero. The Soviets lost the race to put a man on the moon, but the space programme was a powerful propaganda tool, backing the claims of politicians that Russia would soon catch up with and overtake the West.

When Leonid Brezhnev took over in 1964, the intellectual climate froze once more. The first ten years of his office were a time of relative plenty, but beneath the surface there was a vast black market and growing corruption. The party apparatchiks, who benefited from the corruption, had no interest in rocking the boat. When Brezhnev died in 1982, the Politburo was determined to prevent the accession of a younger generation. He was succeeded by the 68-year-old Andropov, followed by the 72-year-old Chernenko.

GLASNOST AND PERESTROIKA

It was only in 1985, when the new leader, 53-year-old Mikhail Gorbachev, announced his policies of perestroika (restructuring) and glasnost (openness), that the true bankruptcy of the old system became apparent. Yet he had no idea of the immense changes that they would bring in their wake. For the first time since 1917 the elections to the Congress of People's Deputies in 1989 contained an element of true choice, with rebels such as human-rights campaigner Andrey Sakharov and Boris Yeltsin winning seats. In the autumn and winter of that year the Warsaw Pact disintegrated as country after country in Eastern Europe declared its independence from the Soviet Union. Local elections within the Union in 1990 brought nationalist candidates to power in the republics and democrats in the most important Russian local councils.

Communist hero fallen from grace after the 1991 coup

In 1991 the Baltic Republics and Russia herself seceded from the Soviet Union. With his massive victory in the election for President of the Russian Republic, Yeltsin gained the mandate he needed to deal the death blow to the Soviet Union. It came after the military coup against Gorbachev in August 1991, when Yeltsin's stand against the tanks in Moscow made him a hero. After Gorbachev's return from house arrest in the Crimea, Yeltsin forced him to outlaw the Communist Party. By the end of the year the Soviet Union was no more as all the republics declared their independence.

The crime rate has fallen from its dizzying high in 1995, as the city's criminal groups, or mafia, have resolved their territorial battles. Moscow has been experiencing something of an economic boom of late, and the standard of living is rising every year. Indeed, Moscow has always been a city apart from the rest of Russia, and in recent years this gulf has widened leading to increased immigration from the provinces and former Soviet republics.

MOSCOW TODAY

The 1990s have had a profound effect on the drab old Moscow of Soviet times. With Russia's vast natural resources attracting a rush of inward investment, Moscow saw the lion's share of that money passing through its hands. A wealthy elite, the "New Russians", suddenly had a vastly improved standard of living and, for instance, car ownership in the city quadrupled in 1991-7. No amount of nightclubs seemed able

MOSCOW THROUGH THE YEAR

Muscovites are ready to celebrate at any time and take their public holidays seriously. Flowers play a particularly important role, from mimosa for International Women's Day to lilac as a symbol that summer is on its way. All the official holidays, as well as some local festivals such as City Day, are marked with concerts and night-time fireworks all over the city. Music,

Lilac, a sign that summer is coming whether classical, folk or contemporary, is the central theme of a large number of festivals, bringing in talent from all over the world. For really big celebrations top Russian and international singers perform for crowds of thousands in Red Square. Even without an official holiday, people love to get out and about, whether skiing in winter, picnicking in spring or summer, or gathering mushrooms in autumn.

SPRING

When flocks of rooks appear in the city, usually in late March, and the violets and snowdrops bloom, spring is reckoned to have arrived.

To warm themselves up after the months of cold, locals celebrate maslennitsa, the feast of blini-making before Lent. Willow branches with catkins are gathered as a symbol of the approaching Palm Sunday and on Forgiveness Sunday, just before Lent, people ask forgiveness of those they may have offended in the past year.

Easter service, Trinity Monastery of St Sergius (see pp162–5)

Wealthy Muscovites usually make a first visit to their dacha at this time to put the garden in order and to plant their own fruits and vegetables.

MARCH

Maslennitsa end Feb–early Mar. A festival involving events such as concerts and carnivals held at venues throughout the city.

International Women's Day (Mezhdunarodnyy den zbensbchin), 8 Mar. Men buy flowers for their womenfolk and congratulate them on the holiday with the words "s prazdnikom". Theatres hold special performances.

St Patrick's Day, first Sunday after 16 March. Moscow's Irish community organize a few local marches and concerts.

Easter Sunday (Paskha), March–early May, following the Orthodox calendar. Churches are filled with chanting and candles. After the greeting Khristos voskres (Christ is risen) and the reply Voistine voskres (He is truly risen), people kiss one another three times.

APRIL

April Fool's Day (Den durakov), 1 Apr. Russians play tricks with particular glee.

Cosmonauts' Day (Den kosmonavtiki), 12 Apr. Space exploration was one of the glories of the Soviet Union and is celebrated with fireworks.

Alternative Festival, end Apr–May. Annual modern music festival in Gorky Park.

MAY

Labour Day (Den truda), 1 May. In the Soviet era, huge military parades filled Red Square. Now much more low-key, with impromptu concerts.

Victory Day (Den pobedy), 9 May. War veterans fill Red Square and Tverskaya ulitsa in memory of the 1945 Nazi surrender. A military parade is held in Red Square.

Border Troopers' Day (Den pogramichnika), 28 May. Retired Border Troopers gather at the Bolshoy Theatre and in Gorky Park to get drunk, sing and watch fireworks.

AVERAGE DAILY HOURS OF SUNSHINE

Sunshine Chart

Moscow is often thought of as a cold and snowy city. However, it has more hours of sunshine in the summer months than many cities in northern Europe. May, June and July are the sunniest months. The short, cold days of winter provide a stark contrast, with an average of only around one hour of sunshine a day.

SUMMER

Life in Moscow is much less hectic in July and August as most enterprises close down for their summer breaks and many Muscovites move out of the city, either to their dacha or to spend holidays abroad. Although most of the theatres also close or go on tour for these two months, there is still plenty going on in and around the city for the visitor to enjoy. Some of the large estates and stately homes outside Moscow, such as Kuskovo (see pp142–3) and Ostankino Palace (see pp144–5), hold outdoor concerts at this time of year. Gorky Park offers a number of options on a fine summer day – from bungee jumping or hiring a rowing boat or pedalo to enjoying a picnic. Outdoor cafés and bars are a favourite with Muscovites remaining in the city and there is even an outdoor casino at the Marilyn Entertainment Complex, at Krasina ulitsa 14.

JUNE

Peter the Great's Birthday (Den rozhdeniya Petra Pervovo), first Sunday after 9 Jun. Costumed celebrations at Kuskovo (see pp142–3).

International Music

Assemblies Festival, mid-June. Russian music through eight centuries performed at concert halls and art galleries.

JULY

US Independence Day,

4 July. A big celebration takes place, enjoyed by Moscow's huge American community and pro-Western Muscovites at the Kuskovo estate.

Navy Day (Den voenno-morskovo flota), first Sunday after 22 July. Spectacular fireworks are accompanied by costumed celebrations across the city. Since Moscow is not a port city, celebrations are not as lavish a scale as those held in St Petersburg.

Moscow International Film Festival, held every two years (in odd-numbered years) in July or August (see p201). A glamorous event attended by both celebrities and the general public, and featuring the latest releases from all over the world.

AUGUST

Summer Music Festival, throughout Aug. Evening recitals of classical music featuring distinguished graduates of the Moscow Conservatory.

Moscow Annual Airshow, end of Aug, in the town of Zhukovskiy, south-east of Moscow. A chance to see famous Russian aeroplanes.

Russian Cinema Day, 27 Aug. Showings of favourite, mostly Russian, films on television and in cinemas all over the city.

Relaxing on a summer's day at an outdoor café in Arbat

Precipitation Chart

In the winter months, precipitation falls mainly as snow, most of which settles until the spring, reaching a depth of 35 cm (14 in). In summer, even hot days are often interrupted by brief, but heavy, rain showers.

AUTUMN

City life begins to pick up as people return from the country and prepare their children for school. In the last weeks of August, Moscow is filled with posters noting the advent of the school year and shops are packed with parents buying new school clothes and books. Theatres open again in September, with premieres of plays and operas.

The crisp autumn weather is perfect for mushroom gathering. Muscovites often head out early in the morning to the forests around the city to hunt for white (the favourite) and brown mushrooms, orange-cap bolets, chanterelles and oyster mushrooms. However, dangerously poisonous as well as edible mushrooms abound and gathering them is best left to the experts.

Chanterelle mushrooms

Other popular autumnal pastimes include horse riding at the Hippodrome (see p202) and taking a boat trip along the Moskva river.

SEPTEMBER

New Academic Year (Novyy uchebnyy god), 1 Sep. The first day back at school. Those going for the first time often take flowers with them.

City Day (Den goroda), first Sunday in Sep.

Celebrations are held all over the city to mark the founding of Moscow in 1147 (see p17). More low-key than it once was as this is also the anniversary of the Beslan massacre in 2004.

OCTOBER

Talents of Russia (Talenty Rossii), 1–10 Oct. Festival of classical music, with musicians from all over the country.

Children with flowers for teachers at the start of the new school year

NOVEMBER

Students of the Moscow ballet schools give the first of their annual winter performances at various venues. This is the worst month to visit as Moscow is dirty and slushy.

AVERAGE MONTHLY TEMPERATURE

Temperature Chart

The chart shows the average minimum and maximum temperatures for each month. Winter temperatures well below freezing may seem daunting, and do limit the length of time it is possible to stay out, but the cold is dry and can be exhilarating and there is very little wind.

WINTER

As the ice thickens and the snow deepens, people head outdoors. Gorky (see p129), Sokolniki and Luzhniki parks become the venues for ice-skating and skiing. The hardened locals, the so-called "walrusers", break the ice at Serebryaniy Bor on the western outskirts of Moscow to take a dip early every morning.

In the midst of winter sports come New Year and Christmas. New Year is the big holiday, while Christmas is celebrated on 7 January, in accordance with the Orthodox calendar. Many people also still celebrate Old New Year which falls a week later on 14 January.

One great pleasure of this season is the Christmas ballet, The Nutcracker, performed at the Bolshoy Theatre (see pp90-91) largely by children.

DECEMBER

New Year's Eve (Novyy god), 31 Dec. Still the biggest holiday of the year, New Year's Eve is celebrated with the local shampanskoe (sparkling wine). This is primarily a family celebration: at circuses and balls, actors dress up as the traditional bringers of presents, the Snow Maiden and Grandfather Frost. More recently, people have begun gathering in Red Square to see in the New Year.

Svyatoslav Richter December Nights

(Dekabrskie večera imeni Svyatoslava Rikbtera), throughout Dec. Classical music dedicated to the Russian pianist at the Pushkin Museum of Fine Arts (see pp78-81).

Russian Winter (Russkaya zima), end Dec-mid Jan. Classical music festival.

JANUARY

Russian Orthodox Christmas

(Rozhdestvo), 7 Jan. Christmas is celebrated in a quieter fashion than Easter, with a traditional visit to an evening service on Christmas eve, when bells ring out through the frosty air from all over Moscow. Children's celebrations are held at various venues, including the Great Kremlin Palace (see p63). The parties are called Yolka (Christmas tree).

Christmas Premier Festival, end Dec-mid Jan. Annual classical music festival.

Christmas in Moscow, first two weeks in Jan. Festival of medieval and classical music.

Ice Sculpture Festival in Gorky Park. This festival lasts for several months, but it is never possible to tell exactly when it will start. It depends entirely on the weather and some years can start as early as December. During the festival Gorky Park is taken over by numerous ice sculptures, usually of fairy-tale characters, which remain in the park until the thaw.

Fisherman fishing through a hole in the ice

Tatyana's Day (Tatyannin den), 25 Jan. St Tatyana's feast day is largely a holiday for students rather than a religious holiday, since the decree founding Moscow University (see p94) was signed on this day in 1755.

FEBRUARY

International Festival of the Orthodox Church, throughout Feb. The music and cultural heritage of the Orthodox Church is celebrated in various city venues.

Valentine's Day (Den svyatovo Valentina), 14 Feb. A recent addition to Moscow's calendar, although it is not as popular as it is in the West.

MOSCOW AT A GLANCE

More than 100 places of interest are described in the Area by Area section of this book. These range from the historic treasures of State and Church, enclosed within the Kremlin walls, to galleries housing incomparable religious icons among spectacular collections of Russian and Western art. The city's liveliest streets and most beautiful parks, which offer different attractions in winter and summer, are also included. To help make the most of a visit, the next 12 pages offer a guide to the very best that Moscow has to offer. Museums and architecture each have their own section, and there is a special feature on Moscow's grandiose metro stations. The sights mentioned here are cross-referenced to their own full entries for ease of use. Below is a selection of the top sights that no visitor should miss.

Moscow's Best: Metro Stations

Not many of the world's underground railways can claim to be tourist attractions and artistic monuments in their own right. The Moscow metro is an exception. Its station platforms and concourses resemble miniature palaces with chandeliers, sculptures and lavish mosaics. Moreover, this is one of the busiest and most efficient metro networks in the world. Some of the finest stations are shown here and further information can be found on pp40–41. Practical details about using the metro are given on pp222–3.

Belorusskaya

Named after the nearby Belorusskiy railway station, Belorusskaya has a central hall with mosaics of rural scenes and a tiled floor based on a traditional pattern from a Belorussian rug.

Mayakovskaya

A bust of poet Vladimir Mayakovsky stands in this station, which is named in his honour. Recesses in the ceiling contain a series of mosaics depicting planes and sporting scenes.

Kievskaya

Large, ostentatious mosaics decorate the walls of this station. They include idealized scenes representing Russia's friendship with the Ukraine and pictures of Soviet agriculture.

Kropotkinskaya

Clean lines and simple colours distinguish this elegant station, designed by Aleksey Dushkin in the 1930s. It is named after the anarchist, Prince Pyotr Kropotkin.

Park Kultury

Niches in the walls of this station's central hall hold white, marble bas-relief medallions. These show people involved in various recreational activities such as ice-skating, reading, playing chess and dancing.

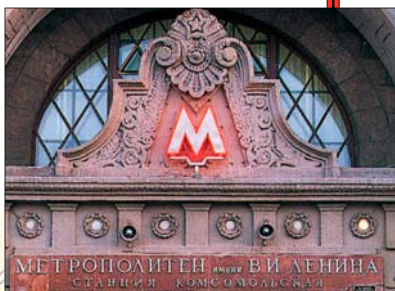

Tverskaya

Arbatskaya

Teatralnaya

The differing cultures of the republics of the former Soviet Union provide the theme for this station. The ceiling panels depict some of their national costumes.

Komsomolskaya

This is the main entrance to Komsomolskaya station, named in honour of the Communist Youth League (Komsomol) which helped to construct the metro.

The main hall of this station contains lifesize bronze statues of ordinary citizens, such as a farmer, who helped to build the Soviet State.

Novokuznetskaya

A bas-relief frieze runs along the central hall of this station, which was constructed in 1943. The frieze shows a variety of Russian military heroes, such as World War II soldiers.

Exploring the Moscow Metro

Bas-relief at
Park Kultury

When the idea of an underground railway was first proposed for Moscow in 1902 the idea was rejected by one local newspaper as “a staggeringly impudent encroachment on everything Russian people hold dear in the city of Moscow”. By the 1930s, however, the need for better transportation had become urgent as the population of the city more than doubled to meet the demands of rapid industrialization. Two prominent young Communists, Nikita Khrushchev and Lazar Kaganovich, were entrusted with building a metro that would serve as a showcase for socialism and the achievements of workers and peasants.

Members of the Communist Youth League helping to build the metro

BUILDING THE METRO

Construction work on the metro began in December 1931, during the period of Stalin’s first Five Year Plan of 1928–33. The Communist Party decreed that “the whole country will build the metro”, so workers – both men and women – were drafted in from all over the Soviet Union. They were assisted by soldiers of the Red Army and by over 13,000 members of the Communist Youth League (Komsomol).

The latter worked as volunteers in their free time and their massive contribution was commemorated by naming Komsomolskaya after them. The materials, too, came from different parts of the country: rails from the steelworks of Kuznetsk, marble from the Urals and Caucasus and granite from Karelia and the Ukraine.

Work was completed on the first 11.6-km (7.2-mile) section of track, linking Sokolniki with Park Kultury, in February 1935 and the first 13 stations were opened in May. Many of those who had worked on the project were subsequently rewarded with medals, including the much-coveted Order of Lenin. Construction work continued rapidly and by 1939 there were 22 stations serving over one million passengers.

METRO DECORATION

Some of the Soviet Union’s finest artists were employed to decorate the metro. Working within the confines of Socialist Realism (see p135), many dealt with themes such as the Revolution, national defence and the Soviet way of life.

The earliest metro stations are generally regarded as the most architecturally successful. Mayakovskaya, designed by Aleksey Dushkin in 1938, won the Grand Prix at the New York World’s Fair. Its spacious halls are supported by columns of stainless steel and marble. Kropotkinskaya (1935) and Ploshchad Revolyutsii (1938) are also by Dushkin. The main hall of the latter has a series of

METRO STATISTICS

The Moscow metro is still expanding, but there are already 165 stations and approximately 265 km (155 miles) of track. Over 9,300 trains operate every day, travelling at speeds of up to 90 km/h (56 mph). The Moscow metro carries 8-9 million passengers per day, more than the London and New York systems combined. During peak periods trains arrive at stations every 1-2 minutes.

marble-lined arches. On either side of each stands a life-sized bronze figure cast by sculptor Matvey Manizer. Red Guards, workers, sailors, sportsmen and women, a Young Pioneer and a mother and child are among the “everyday heroes” who made the Revolution possible or helped to build the subsequent Soviet State. Several stations, including Komsomolskaya, consist of two or more linked sections on different metro lines. One of Komsomolskaya’s two sections, on the Kirovo-Frunzenskaya line, was built in 1935. Its decor is relatively restrained, with rose-coloured marble pillars and majolica panels by Yevgeniy Lanseray showing heroic metro workers. The other station, on the circle line, was completed 17 years later and is much more ostentatious, with florid stucco mouldings and glittering chandeliers. Designed by leading architect Aleksey Shchusev it was also a prizewinner at the New York World's Fair. The gold mosaics showing military parades and figures from Russian history are the work of artist Pavel Korin.

Martial themes predominated during and after World War II. At Novokuznetskaya (1943), for example, architects Vladimir Gelfreikh and Igor Rozhin commissioned a bas-relief frieze from Nikolay Tomskiy showing Russian military heroes as diverse as Minin and Pozharskiy (see p108) and Field Marshal Kutuzov (see p158).

Many of the stations built in the 1940s and 1950s extol the virtues of the Soviet regime. Ceramic panels at Teatralnaya (1940) celebrate the arts of the former Soviet Republics, while mosaics at Belorusskaya (1952) and Kievskaya (1937 and 1954) show healthy, contented peasants celebrating agricultural abundance. These ignore the terrible famine that resulted from Stalin's forced collectivization policy of the early 1930s.

In the Soviet mind, athletic prowess was the natural preparation for heroic achievement. Sport and recreation are the twin themes of the bas-reliefs by artist Sergey Rabinovich at Park Kultury (1935 and 1949).

Even the station exteriors above ground were designed to work as propaganda. Seen from above, the entrance to Arbatskaya (1935) is in the shape of the Soviet red star.

Although financial constraints now impose limits, artistic leeway has still been possible in the design of some of the newer stations such as Chekhovskaya (1987), and Park Pobedy, the world's deepest metro station, completed in 2003.

THE METRO AND WAR

The early metro lines were laid deep underground so that they could be used as bomb shelters in times of war.

By November 1941 German troops had reached the outskirts of Moscow and the Soviet Union was fighting for survival.

Mayakovskaya, completed just three years earlier, became the headquarters of the Anti-Aircraft Defence Forces. It was in the station's spacious central hall that Stalin addressed generals and party activists the evening before the Red Army marched off to the front.

Kirovskaya (now known as Chistye Prudy) was the headquarters of the General Staff throughout World War II. It was here that Stalin and his advisors planned the first offensives against the Nazis.

Consequently, the metro system became an important symbol of resistance to the Nazi invasion. In fact, its propaganda value was deemed so great that the designs for the mosaics at Novokuznetskaya were evacuated from St Petersburg when their creator, Viktor Frolov, died there during the prolonged siege of 1941–4.

METRO MUSEUM

The history and workings of the Moscow metro are fully explained in this interesting museum, located above the main hall of Sportivnaya in Sparrow Hills (see p129). Some rather dated photomontages show the construction of the track and stations. There are numerous displays including models of trains and escalators, a reconstruction of a driver's cabin and the first ticket, sold in 1935.

Moscow's Best: Architecture

Visitors to Moscow are often pleasantly surprised by the wealth and variety of architecture the city has to offer. As well as magnificent palaces and cathedrals, such as those in the Kremlin, there are also smaller churches and chapels, homely boyars' residences, imposing Neo-Classical mansions and some beautiful municipal buildings. A stark contrast to this older architecture is provided by early 20th-century Constructivist buildings and Communist landmarks such as Stalinist-Gothic skyscrapers. For further information about architecture see pp44–5.

Gorky House-Museum

Stunning stained-glass windows grace the Gorky House-Museum, a Style-Moderne masterpiece built by Fyodor Shekhtel in 1900.

Cathedral of the Assumption

A miraculous fusion of Renaissance and Early-Russian styles, this superb cathedral was built in 1475–9 to a design by Italian architect Aristotele Fioravanti.

Foreign Ministry

This is one of seven skyscrapers designed in a hybrid style often referred to as Stalinist Gothic. The Foreign Ministry building was finished in 1952 shortly before Stalin's death.

Moscow Old University

The colonnade of pillars along the front of this building and its ochre and white colouring are typical Neo-Classical features.

Pashkov House

The Neo-Classical Pashkov House (being restored) has a colonnaded porch with relief sculptures.

Polytechnical Museum

The central part of the Polytechnical Museum, built in 1877, is the work of Ippolit Monigbetti. It is an outstanding example of Russian Revival, a style that draws heavily on the architecture of Russia's past.

St Basil's Cathedral

Pointed roofs over the entrance steps and tiers of arched gables typify the stunning architectural diversity of this cathedral, built in 1555–61 for Ivan the Terrible.

Church of the Resurrection in Kadashi

This Moscow-Baroque church has tiers of ornate limestone carvings in place of the kokoshniki gables normally seen on Early-Russian churches. The church's onion domes are a traditional feature, but they are an unusual jade green colour.

Exploring Moscow's Architecture

Part of a floral fresco in St Basil's Cathedral

Russian architecture has always been innovative. The medieval Novgorod, Yaroslavl and Pskov schools of architecture developed several of the distinctive features found on Moscow's churches. These included the onion dome, rounded zakomary gables and kokosbniki gables, which are semi-circular or shaped like the cross-section of an onion. In later centuries Moscow's architects became increasingly influential, developing new styles, such as Constructivism, and giving a Russian flavour to others.

Study in the Palace of the Romanov Boyars

In the 15th and 16th centuries the tsars employed a succession of Italian architects to construct prestigious buildings in the Kremlin. They combined the Early-Russian style with Italian Renaissance features to create magnificent buildings such as the Cathedral of the Assumption (see pp58–9).

Another 16th-century innovation was the spire-like tent roof, used, for example, on St Basil's Cathedral (see pp108–9). In the mid-17th century Patriarch Nikon banned its use, insisting that plans for new churches must be based on ancient Byzantine designs.

The majority of Moscow's early secular buildings have not survived. The few exceptions include the ornate 16th-century Palace of the Romanov Boyars (see pp102–3) and the charming early 16th-century Old English Court (see p102).

EARLY RUSSIAN

Moscow's earliest buildings were constructed entirely from wood. From around the 14th century, stone and brick began to be used for important buildings, but wood continued to be the main building material until the great fire of 1812 (see p24) when much of the city was burnt to the ground.

The majority of Moscow's oldest surviving buildings are churches. One of the earliest is the Cathedral of the Saviour in the Monastery of the Saviour and Andronicus (see p140).

THE NEW PATRIOTISM

The reconstruction of the city's pre-Revolutionary buildings, including the Kazan Cathedral (see p105) and the Cathedral of Christ the Redeemer (see p74), is evidence of a growing nostalgia for Russia's past, and a renewed interest in the nation's architectural heritage. The revival of the Orthodox Church, in particular, has led to the restoration of hundreds of churches across Moscow.

BAROQUE

The Bridge Tower (1670s) at Izmaylovo Park (see p141) is an early example of Moscow Baroque. Its filigree limestone trimmings and pilaster decoration, set against a background of red brick, are typical of the style. The gate churches in the Novodevichiy Convent (see pp130–31), the buildings of the Krutitskoe Mission (see p140) and the spectacular Church of the Resurrection in Kadashi (see p122), with its limestone ornamentation carved to resemble lace, are also fine examples of this style of architecture.

A number of Baroque buildings, including the Church of the Intercession in Fili (see p128), were built with money from the wealthy and powerful Naryshkin family. This has led to Moscow Baroque also being known as Naryshkin Baroque.

NEO-CLASSICAL

The Accession of Catherine the Great in 1762 heralded a new direction for Russian architecture. She favoured the Neo-Classical style, which drew on the architecture of ancient Greece and Rome. This style has been used to great effect in the Pashkov House (see p75), thought to have been designed by Vasily Bazhenov in 1784 (sadly, the building is now covered by hoarding).

Bazhenov's assistant, the prolific Matvey Kazakov, demonstrated the flexibility of Neo-Classicism in his designs for a wide range of buildings, including churches, hospitals, the Moscow Old University (see p94) and the House of Unions (see pp88–9). He is best known for the Senate (see pp66–7) in the Kremlin.

The huge fire that followed Napoleon's brief occupation of the city in 1812 led to a wholesale reconstruction. Moscow's nobility built new homes along ulitsa Prechistenka (see p74) in the newly fashionable Empire style. Leading architects of this more decorative style included Afanasiy Grigorev and Osip Bove, who designed Theatre Square (see p88).

A Neo-Classical bas-relief in the House of Unions, built in the 1780s

HISTORICISM AND STYLE MODERNE

Historicism replaced Neo-Classicism in the mid-19th century. It arose from a desire to create a national style by reviving architectural styles from the past. The Great Kremlin Palace (see p63) and State Armoury (see pp64–5), both designed by Konstantin Ton around 1840, are typical. They combine various styles including Renaissance, Classical and Baroque. Ton also designed the extravagant Byzantine-style

The Style-Moderne Gorky House-Museum

The House of Friendship, a wonderful example of Eclecticism

Cathedral of Christ the Redeemer (see p74), finished in 1883 and rebuilt in 1994–7.

Eclecticism combined past and present architectural styles from all over the world to create fantastical buildings such as the House of Friendship (see p95), which was designed by Vladimir Mazyrin in 1898.

Traditional wooden architecture and folk art were rich sources of inspiration for the architects that formulated the Russian-Revival style. The flamboyant Historical Museum (see p106) and Polytechnical Museum (see p110) are fine examples of the genre. However, the finest, and most functional, is GUM (see p107) designed by Aleksandr Pomerantsev.

Style Moderne was a radical new architectural style akin to Art Nouveau. One of the earliest examples is the Hotel Metropol (see p88), designed in 1899 by Englishman William Walcot. The greatest advocate of Style Moderne was Fyodor Shekhtel. The mansion he built for Stepan Ryabushinskiy is now the Gorky House-Museum (see p95). It is highly unconventional and uses mosaic friezes, glazed brick and stained glass to stunning effect.

ARCHITECTURE AFTER THE REVOLUTION

Constructivism was a novel attempt to combine form and function, and was the most popular style to emerge in the decade after the Revolution. The offices of the newspaper Izvestiya, on Pushkin Square (see p97), were designed by Grigoriy Barkhin in 1927. His use of glass and reinforced concrete to create geometrical designs is typical of the Constructivist style. Another leading Constructivist was Konstantin Melnikov. The unique Melnikov House (see p72), which consists of two interlocking cylinders, is the home that he built for himself in 1927. In the 1930s Stalin formulated a grand plan to rebuild large areas of the city. He favoured a new monumental style and Constructivism went out of vogue. The monumental style is exemplified by Aleksey Shchusev's grandiose "proletarian" apartments at the lower end of Tverskaya ulitsa and culminates in Stalinist Gothic. This term is used to describe the seven matching skyscrapers erected at key points in the city in the 1940s and 1950s. The Foreign Ministry building (see p70), designed by architects Mikhail Minkus and Vladimir Gelfreikh, is typical of this style, which is often called "wedding-cake" architecture.

Mosaic of irises from the frieze around the Gorky House-Museum

Moscow's Best: Museums

Moscow has more than 80 museums offering a fascinating insight into the history and culture of the people of Russia. Some, such as the Tretyakov Gallery and State Armoury, have collections including works by world-famous artists and craftsmen, while others house exhibits of local or specialist interest. Among the most evocative are those commemorating the lives of artists, writers and musicians. The rooms where they lived and worked have been lovingly preserved. For further information on museums see pp48-9.

State Armoury

This elaborate 17th-century enamel work is exhibited in the State Armoury, along with a dazzling array of gold and silverware, jewellery and royal regalia. The current Armoury building was constructed in 1844 on the orders of Tsar Nicholas I.

Shalyapin House-Museum

Portraits of the opera star Fyodor Shalyapin on display in his former home include formal paintings, images of him on stage and drawings by his children.

Pushkin Museum of Fine Arts

In addition to a magnificent collection of European art, this gallery houses artifacts from ancient Egypt, Greece and Rome, including this Egyptian funeral mask.

Tolstoy House-Museum

For over 20 years this traditional house was the winter home of Leo Tolstoy, author of the epic novel War and Peace. It is now an evocative museum which recaptures the daily lives of the writer and his family.

Lenin Mausoleum

The red and black pyramid of the Lenin Mausoleum was erected in 1930 to a design by architect Aleksey Shchusev. It contains the embalmed body of Vladimir Lenin, the first Soviet leader.

Mayakovsky Museum

This thought-provoking museum commemorates the revolutionary poet, playwright and artist Vladimir Mayakovsky. The abstract exhibits in this room symbolize his childhood in Georgia.

Palace of the Romanov Boyars

The restored interiors and luxurious clothes and possessions in this house effectively evoke the daily lives of the Moscow aristocracy in the 16th and 17th centuries. The house was constructed for boyar Nikita Romanov.

Nijinsky's ballet shoe, Bakhrushin Theatre Museum

Wherever visitors' interests lie, whether it be in painting and the fine arts, science, the Revolution, the history of the Russian theatre or the lives of the nobility, there will be something in Moscow's museums to appeal to them. As well as the many museums in the city, there are a number of country estates in the area around Moscow. Several of these, including Kuskovo and Kolomenskoe, are easily accessible by metro and make good half-day or day excursions (see p227). However, it is worth bearing in mind that a number of museums are currently undergoing much-needed renovation and, in some cases, ideological reassessment.

PAINTING AND DECORATIVE ARTS

The world's most important collection of Russian art is on display in the recently renovated Tretyakov Gallery (see pp118–21). The gallery owns over 100,000 works, but only a fraction of them are on show at any one time. They include amongst others, paintings by most of the group of artists called the Wanderers (peredvizhniki). The gallery's extensive collection of post-Revolution (20th-Century) art is now housed in the New Tretyakov Gallery (see p135). The Tropinin Museum (see pp124–5) has a fine collection of works by the 19th-century portrait artist Vasily Tropinin and his contemporaries.

The Museum of Private Collections (see p75) is a new gallery, housed in a 19th-century building. It exhibits previously unseen drawings, watercolours, sketches and paintings, mainly by Russian artists of the 19th and 20th centuries.

Next door is the Pushkin Museum of Fine Arts (see pp78–81), which is particularly known for its collection of works by Impressionist, Post-Impressionist and 20th-century artists. Visitors can also see earlier paintings by artists such as Botticelli, Rembrandt and Rubens, and outstanding artifacts from ancient Egypt donated by Vladimir Golenishchev.

A superb collection of decorative and applied art spanning the last seven centuries or so is housed in the State Armoury (see pp64–5) in the Kremlin. There are rooms devoted to arms and armour, jewellery, gold and silverware, religious vestments and imperial regalia.

HOUSE-MUSEUMS

The houses and flats where many important Russian cultural figures lived have been preserved as museums. The sturdy, timber-framed Tolstoy House-Museum (see p134) contains many personal possessions that belonged to Leo Tolstoy. The novelist and his family spent many winters in the house. Among their regular visitors was the playwright Anton Chekhov. The house where this writer began his career in the 1880s is also open to the public as the Chekhov House-Museum (see p96). Across the road from Chekhov's house is the Shalyapin House-Museum (see p83) where the great opera singer, Fyodor Shalyapin, lived. Visitors can enjoy the beautifully furnished rooms while listening to old recordings of his singing.

The Stanislavskiy House-Museum (see p93) is the former home of Konstantin Stanislavskiy, theatrical director and the co-founder of the Moscow Arts Theatre (see p92). It contains costumes, props and other memorabilia.

Along with a few items once owned by Alexander Pushkin, the Pushkin House-Museum (see p73) contains an interesting display of pictures that show what Moscow was like in 1831, when the poet lived here. The Bely House-Museum (see p73), in the building next door, was once the home of the Symbolist poet, Andrei Bely. Nearby is the Skryabin House-Museum (see p72), the last home of composer Aleksandr Skryabin.

The tower blocks of Novyy Arbat dwarf the Lermontov House-Museum (see pp82–3), the simple timber house where Pushkin's contemporary, the poet Mikhail Lermontov, was brought up by his grandmother in the early 1830s.

The extraordinary life of Vladimir Mayakovsky is brilliantly realized in the displays in the Mayakovsky Museum (see p111). This flat, near the former KGB building (see p112), is where the Futurist poet lived from 1919–30.

The artist Viktor Vasnetsov designed his own home. In his studio, now the Vasnetsov House-Museum (see p144), visitors can see his enormous canvases based on folk tales.

The Tchaikovsky House-Museum (see p159) at Klin still contains furnishings used by composer Pyotr Tchaikovsky, including the desk where he finished his Sixth Symphony.

COUNTRY ESTATES

Several palaces and estates on the outskirts of Moscow are open to the public. Ostankino Palace (see pp144–5), built in the 18th century for the fabulously wealthy Sheremetev family, is famous for its exquisite theatre, where serf actors and musicians once took the stage. Kuskovo (see pp142–3) was also built for the Sheremetevs. In the palace's beautiful gardens is a ceramics museum.

A number of superb 16th- and 17th-century buildings still stand at the former royal estate of Kolomenskoe (see pp138–9). Also on the estate is a fascinating museum of wooden architecture.

Picturesque, Gothic-style ruins are all that remain of the palace at Tsaritsyno (see p137). This ambitious project, commissioned by Catherine the Great, was never finished.

Works of art by 19th- and 20th-century Russian artists are on show at the Abramtsevo Estate-Museum (see p160), formerly an artists' colony.

HISTORY MUSEUMS

A number of museums and other sites in and around the city provide fascinating glimpses into Moscow's past.

The History of Moscow Museum (see p111) traces the city's history, with earliest exhibits including archaeological finds from around the Kremlin. There is speculation that the museum may be moved.

The life of the boyars (see p20) in Moscow in the early 17th century is recreated in the Palace of the Romanov Boyars (see pp102–3).

Visitors interested in Napoleon's winter invasion of Russia in 1812 (see pp23–4) will want to make the day trip to Borodino (see p158). This was the scene of one of the bloodiest encounters of the campaign. There are over 30 monuments around the battlefield and a museum nearby tells the story of the battle. They may also like to visit the Borodino

Panorama Museum (see p129) on Kutuzovskiy prospekt. This circular pavilion contains an enormous painting of the famous battle.

The monumental scale of the Lenin Mausoleum (see p107), containing Lenin's embalmed body, gives an insight into the importance of the role played by Lenin (see pp27–8) in 20th-century Russian history.

Displays at the Museum of Modern History (see p97) cover Russian history from 1900 until the collapse of the Soviet Union in 1991. Sweet wrappers depicting Marx and Lenin and home-made grenades are among the exhibits.

The Museum of the Great Patriotic War (see p129) has dioramas of major battles from World War II, shown largely from a Soviet viewpoint.

SPECIALIST MUSEUMS

Among the city's handful of specialist museums is the Polytechnical Museum (see p110), which charts important developments in science and technology in Russia.

The Bakhrushin Theatre Museum (see p125) houses an exciting collection of theatre memorabilia, including ballet shoes worn by Nijinsky, while the Shchusev Museum of Architecture (see p82) gives a history of Russian architecture.

THE KREMLIN

Citadel of the Tsars, headquarters of the Soviet Union and now the residence of the Russian president, for centuries the Kremlin has been a symbol of the power of the State. In 1156, Prince Yuriy Dolgorukiy chose the confluence of the Moskva and Neglinnaya rivers as the site for the first wooden Kremlin (kremli means “fortress”). Late in the 15th century, Tsar Ivan III (see p18) invited several leading Italian architects to build a sumptuous new complex. They designed the Cathedral of the Assumption and the Faceted Palace, among other buildings, in a fascinating fusion of Early-Russian and imported Renaissance styles (see p44).

The Kremlin did not escape the architectural vandalism of the 1930s, when it was closed and several of its churches and palaces were destroyed on Stalin's orders (see p75). Only in 1955, two years after his death, was the Kremlin partially reopened to the public.

Street by Street: The Kremlin

The Kremlin is home to the Russian president and the seat of his administration. As a result less than half of it is accessible to the public, but highlights including the State Armoury, the Patriarch's Palace and the churches in Cathedral Square are open to visitors. Christians have worshipped on this site for more than eight centuries, but their early stone churches were demolished in the 1470s to make way for the present magnificent ensemble of cathedrals. In imperial times, these were the setting for great state occasions such as coronations, baptisms and burials.

The palace contains several vast ceremonial halls. The sumptuous stucco work of St George's Hall provides a magnificent backdrop for state receptions. Its marble walls are inscribed with the names of military heroes 11

This tower takes its name from the Trinity Monastery of St Sergius (see pp162–5), which once had a mission nearby. The tower's Trinity Gate used to be the entrance for patriarchs and the tsars' wives and daughters. Today it is one of only two that admit visitors. The other is in the Borovitskaya Tower (see p66) to the southwest.

At 76 m (249 ft) high, the seven-storey Trinity Tower is the Kremlin's tallest. It was built in 1495–9 and in 1516 was linked by a bridge over the Neglinnaya river to the Kutafya Tower. The river now runs underground and the Kutafya Tower is the sole survivor of the circle of towers that were originally built to defend the Kremlin walls.

In September 1812 Napoleon triumphantly marched his army into the Kremlin through the Trinity Gate – they left only a month later when the Russians set fire to the city (see pp24–5).

Commissioned by Russian premier Nikita Khrushchev in 1959 to host Communist Party conferences, the Palace of Congresses is the Kremlin's only modern building. It was completed in 1961 by a team of architects led by Mikhail Posokhin. Roughly 120 m (395 ft) long, the palace was sunk 15 m (49ft) into the ground so as not to dwarf the surrounding buildings.

Until 1991 the 6,000-seat auditorium was the venue for political meetings. Now it is used by the Kremlin Ballet Company (see p200) and for staging operas and rock concerts.

10am–5pm Fri–Wed.

The metropolitans of the Russian Orthodox Church lived on the site of the current Patriarch's Palace for many years. In the 16th century, the patriarchate was created, and the patriarch took over from the metropolitans as the most senior figure in the Russian Church. As a result the bishops of Krutitsy became metropolitans (see p140) while the patriarch lived in the Kremlin.

When Nikon became the patriarch in 1652, he felt that the existing residence and the small Church of the Deposition of the Robe (see pp62–3) were not grand enough for him. He had the residence extended and renovated to create the Patriarch's Palace, with its integral Church of the Twelve Apostles. Completed in 1656, the work was carried out by a team of master builders led by Ivan Semenov and Alexey Korolkov.

The palace is now the Museum of 17th-Century Life and Applied Art. Recently renovated, it comprises a new exhibition hall and more than 1,000 exhibits drawn from the State Armoury collection (see pp64–5) and from churches and monasteries that were destroyed by Stalin in the 1930s (see p75).

Entry to the museum is up a short flight of stairs. The first room houses an exhibition on the history of the palace. In the Gala Antechamber is a dazzling array of 17th-century patriarchs' robes. Some of Nikon's own vestments are on display, including a chasuble (sakkos), a set of beautifully carved staffs and a cowl made from damask and satin, and embroidered with gold thread.

Two rooms in the museum have been refurbished in the style of a 17th-century boyar's apartment. In one of them is a display of old, hand-written books, including Tsarevich Alexis' primer. Each page features one letter of the alphabet and a selection of objects beginning with that letter.

Tsarevich Alexis' school book

The impressive Chamber of the Cross, to the left of the stairs, has an area of 280 sq m (3,013 sq ft). When this ceremonial hall was built, it was the largest room in Russia without columns supporting its roof. Its ceiling is painted with a delicate tracery of flowers. The room was later used for producing consecrated oil called miro, and the silver vats and ornate stove used still stand in the room.

Nikon's rejection of new architectural forms, such as tent roofs, dictated a traditional design for the Church of the Twelve Apostles. Located to the right of the stairs, it houses some brilliant icons, including works by master iconographers such as Semen Ushakov. The iconostasis dates from around 1700. It was brought to the church from the Kremlin Convent of the Ascension prior to its demolition in 1929.

PATRIARCH NIKON

A zealous reformer of the Russian Orthodox Church, Patriarch Nikon was so intent on returning it to its Byzantine roots that he caused his adversaries, the Old Believers, to split from the rest of the Church. Nikon also advocated the supremacy of Church over State, angering Tsar Alexis (see p19). His autocratic style made him unpopular and he retreated to a monastery outside the city. He was deposed in 1667.

This elegant bell tower (currently under restoration) was built in 1505–8 to a design by Marco Bon Frijazin. It takes its name from the Church of St Ivan Climacus, which stood on the site in the 14th century. The bell tower is called "the Great" because of its height. In 1600 it became the tallest building in Moscow when Tsar Boris Godunov added a third story to extend it to 81m (266 ft).

The four-storey Assumption Belfry, with its single gilded dome, was built beside the bell tower by Petrok Maliy in 1532–43. It holds 21 bells, the largest of which, the 64-tonne Assumption Bell, traditionally tolled three times when the tsar died. A small museum on the first floor houses changing displays about the Kremlin. The tent-roofed annex next to the belfry was commissioned by Patriarch Filaret in 1642.

Outside the bell tower is the enormous Tsar Bell. The largest in the world, it weighs over 200 tonnes. When it fell from the bell tower and shattered in a fire in 1701, the fragments were used in a second bell ordered by Tsarina Anna. This still lay in its casting pit when the Kremlin caught fire again in 1737. Cold water was poured over the hot bell and a large piece (displayed beside the bell) broke off.

Uspenskiy sobor

From the early 14th century, the Cathedral of the Assumption was the most important church in Moscow. It was here that princes were crowned and the metropolitans and patriarchs of the Orthodox Church were buried. In the 1470s Ivan the Great (see p18) decided to build a more imposing cathedral, to reflect the growing might of the nation during his reign. When the first version collapsed possibly in an earthquake, Ivan summoned the Italian architect Aristotele Fioravanti to Moscow. He designed a light and spacious masterpiece in the spirit of the Renaissance.

Scenes from the Life of Metropolitan Peter

Attributed to the great artist Dionysius (see p61), this 15th-century icon is located on the cathedral's south wall. It depicts different events in the life of this religious and political leader.

★ Frescoes

In 1642–4, a team of artists headed by Sidor Pospeev and Ivan and Boris Paisein painted these frescoes. The walls of the cathedral were first gilded to give the look of an illuminated manuscript.

Metropolitans' and patriarchs' tombs line the walls of the nave and the crypt. Almost all of the leaders of the Russian Orthodox Church are buried in the cathedral.

Cathedral of the Archangel 6

Архангельский собор
Arkhangel'skiy sobor

The Kremlin. Map 7 A2.

This was the last of the great cathedrals in the Kremlin to be built. It was commissioned by Ivan III in 1505, shortly before his death. Designed by a Venetian architect, Aleviz Novyy, it is a skilful combination of Early-Russian and Italian Renaissance architecture. The most striking of the Italian features is the scallop shell motif underneath the zakomary gables (see p44).

This site was the burial place for Moscow's princes and tsars from 1340, first in an earlier cathedral and then in the current building. The tombs of the tsars, white stone sarcophagi with bronze covers inscribed in Old Slavonic, are in the nave. The tomb of Tsarevich Dmitry, the youngest son of Ivan the Terrible (see p18), has a carved, painted canopy above it. The tsars were no longer buried here after the capital city was moved to St Petersburg in 1712. Peter II, who died of smallpox in Moscow in 1730, was the only later ruler to be buried here.

The walls, pillars and domes of the cathedral are covered with superb frescoes painted in 1652–66 by a team of artists led by Semen Ushakov, the head of the icon workshop in the State Armoury (see pp64–5). There are over 60 full-length idealized portraits of Russian rulers, as well as some striking images of the Archangel Michael, traditionally the protector of the rulers of early Moscow.

The fresco in the cathedral's central cupola depicts the threefold nature of God. The Father holds the Son on his lap and the Holy Spirit, in the form of a white dove, hovers between them.

The four-tiered iconostasis was constructed in 1680–81.

However, the Icon of the Archangel Michael on the lowest tier dates from the 14th century.

Cathedral of the Annunciation 7

Благовещенский собор
Blagovesbchenskiy sobor

The Kremlin. Map 7 A2.

Unlike the other Kremlin cathedrals, which were created by Italians, the ornate Cathedral of the Annunciation is a wholly Russian affair. Commissioned by Ivan III in 1484 as a royal chapel, it stands be-side the Faceted Palace (see p62), which is all that remains of a large palace built for Ivan III around the same time. The cathedral, built by architects from Pskov (see p44), originally had three domes and open galleries on all sides but, after a fire in 1547, the corner chapels were added and the galleries were enclosed. On the south façade is the Groznenskiy Porch, added by Ivan the Terrible when he contravened church law by marrying for the fourth time in 1572. Barred from attending religious services, he could only watch through a grille in the porch.

The glorious Cathedral of the Annunciation

The whole of the interior of the cathedral, including the galleries, is painted with frescoes. The artwork around the iconostasis was painted in 1508 by the monk Feodosius, the son of the icon painter Dionysius who worked on the Cathedral of the Assumption (see pp58–9). The warm colours of the frescoes create an atmosphere of intimacy (this was the tsars' family church). At the same time the vertical thrust of the pillars draws the eye upwards to the cupola and its awe-inspiring painting of Christ Pantocrator (Christ as ruler of the universe).

Three of the greatest masters of icon painting in Russia contributed to the iconostasis, widely considered the finest in Russia. Theophanes the Greek painted the images of Christ, the Virgin and the Archangel Gabriel in the Deesis Tier, while the Icon of the Archangel Michael on this tier is attributed to Andrey Rublev. Several of the icons in the Festival Tier, including The Annunciation and The Nativity were also painted by Rublev. Most of the other icons in this tier, including the The Last Supper and The Crucifixion are the work of Prokhor Gorodetskiy.

The Art of Icon Painting in Russia

The Russian Orthodox church uses icons for both worship and teaching and there are strict rules for creating each image. Icons were thought to be imbued with power from the saint they depicted and were invoked for protection during wars. Because content was more important than style, old revered icons were often repainted. The first icons were brought to Russia from

Festival Tier icon

Byzantium. Kiev was Russia's main icon painting centre until the Mongols conquered it in 1240. Influential schools then sprang up in Novgorod and the Vladimir-Suzdal area. The Moscow school was founded in the late 14th century and its greatest period was during the 15th century, when renowned icon-painters such as Andrey Rublev and Dionysius were at work.

The Virgin of Vladimir, from 12th-century Byzantium, is highly venerated and has had a profound influence on Russian iconography.

Theophanes the Greek (c.1340–1405) is thought to have painted this icon of the Assumption (ascent into heaven) of the Virgin Mary. Originally from Byzantium, Theophanes became famous first in Novgorod and then in Moscow. The figures in his icons are renowned for their delicate features and individual expressions.

Andrey Rublev became a monk at the Trinity Monastery of St Sergius (see pp162–5). Later he moved to a monastery in Moscow. Rublev painted this icon of the Archangel Michael in about 1410. The benevolent appearance of the archangel is typical of Rublev's figures.

ICONOSTASIS

Separating the sanctuary from the main part of the church, the iconostasis also symbolizes the boundary between the spiritual and temporal worlds. The icons are arranged in tiers (usually four, five or six), each with its own subject matter and significance.

The Festival Tier depicts important feast days and holidays in the Russian Orthodox calendar.

An additional tier between the Local and Deesis Tiers often depicts the months of the year.

The top tier of the iconostasis depicts patriarchs and prophets of the Old Testament.

The Deesis Tier is the most important in the iconostasis and depicts saints, apostles and archangels.

The Royal Gate, at the centre of the Local Tier, is usually decorated with panels showing the four apostles and the Annunciation – when Mary learns she is to bear the Son of God. The gate represents the entrance from the temporal to the spiritual world.

The Local Tier contains icons of saints with a strong link to the church, such as the church's namesake or saints after whom patrons of the church were named.

Faceted Palace ④

The Kremlin. Map 7 A2.  to public.

In the 19th century, the Faceted Palace, along with the Terem Palace, was incorporated into the Great Kremlin Palace. Named after its distinctive stonework façade, the Faceted Palace is all that is left of a larger 15th-century royal palace. It was commissioned by Ivan III (see p18) in 1485 and finished six years later. The Faceted Palace is the work of two Italian architects, Marco Ruffo and Pietro Solario.

The first floor of the Faceted Palace consists of the main hall and adjoining Sacred Vestibule. Both are decorated with rich frescoes and gilded carvings. The splendid vaulted main hall has an area of about 500 sq m (5,380 sq ft). It was the throne room and banqueting hall of the tsars and is now used for holding receptions.

On the palace's southern façade is the Red Staircase. The tsars passed down this staircase on their way to the Cathedral of the Assumption for their coronations. The last such procession was at the coronation of Nicholas II in 1896.

In the Streltsy Rebellion of 1682 (see p22) several of Peter the Great's relatives were hurled down the Red Staircase onto the pikes of the Streltsy guard.

Demolished by Stalin in the 1930s, the staircase was rebuilt in 1994 at great expense.

The Kremlin. Map 7 A1.

Crowned by a single golden dome, this beautiful, but simply designed, church was built as the domestic church of the metropolitans in 1484-6. It was designed by architects from Pskov (see p44)

The church is named after a Byzantine feast day, which celebrates the arrival, in the city of Constantinople, of a robe supposed to have belonged to the Virgin Mary. The robe is believed to have saved the city from invasion several times.

The exterior of the church has distinctive ogee arches, which are shaped like the cross-section of an onion and feature on many Russian churches from this period. They are a favourite device of the Pskov school of architecture. Inside the church, the walls and slender columns are covered with 17th-century frescoes by artists including Ivan Borisov, Sidor Pospeev and Semen Abramov. Many depict scenes from the life of the Virgin. Others depict Christ, the prophets, royalty and the Moscow metropolitans.

The impressive iconostasis was created by Nazariy Istomin in 1627. To the left of the royal gate is a splendid image of the Trinity and to its right is the patronal Icon of the Deposition of the Virgin's Robe.

Commissioned by Tsar Mikhail Romanov (see p19), the Terem Palace was built next to the Faceted Palace in 1635-7. It was constructed by a team of stonemasons led by Bazhen Ogurtsov. The palace takes its name from the terem, a pavilion-like structure with a red and white chequered roof on top of the main building. The interior has small, low-vaulted, simply furnished rooms.

The Tsar had five sumptuous rooms situated on the third floor of the palace. The anteroom, where boyars (see p20) and foreign dignitaries waited to be received, leads into the council chamber, where the tsar held meetings with boyars.

Beyond this are the throne room, the tsar's bedchamber and a small prayer room.

Most of the splendid Terem Palace is not visible from the areas of the Kremlin to which the public have access. The eleven richly decorated onion domes of the four palace churches, at one end of the palace, are all that can be seen.

Great Kremlin Palace 11

Bolsшой Kremlevskiy dvorets

The Kremlin. Map 7 A2.  to public.

The Impressive 125-m (410-ft) façade of this yellow and white palace is best admired from the Kremlin embankment, outside the Kremlin walls. The Great Kremlin Palace was built to replace the 18th-century

Kremlin Palace that previously stood on the site but had become dilapidated. In 1837 Tsar Nicholas I commissioned the Great Kremlin Palace as the Moscow residence of the royal family, where they stayed when visiting from St Petersburg, then the capital. Designed by a team of architects led by Konstantin Ton (see p45), it took 12 years to build. Ton's design integrated the Terem and Faceted Palaces with the new palace, creating a single complex. He also rebuilt the State Armoury (see pp64-5).

On the palace's ground floor are the luxurious private rooms of the royal family. The state chambers, on the first floor, include several vast ceremonial halls. The imposing St George's Hall has white walls engraved in gold with the names of those awarded the Order of St George, one of Russia's highest military decorations.

Despite spending massive amounts on the interior, the tsar rarely used the palace. In the 1930s two of the halls were joined to form a huge meeting room for the Supreme Soviet. Now the palace's halls are used to receive foreign dignitaries.

State Armoury 12

The collection of the State Armoury represents the wealth accumulated by Russian princes and tsars over many centuries. The first written mention of a state armoury occurs in 1508, but there were forges in the Kremlin producing weapons and armour as early as the 13th century. Later, gold- and silversmiths, workshops producing icons and embroidery, and the Office of the Royal Stables all moved into the Kremlin. The original armoury was demolished in 1960 to make way for the State Kremlin Palace (see p56). The current State Armoury was built as a museum on the orders of Nicholas I. It was designed by Konstantin Ton (see p45) in 1844 and was completed in 1851.

Rising majestically above Red Square to a height of 70 m (230 ft), Saviour's Tower is named after an icon of Christ installed over its gate in 1648. The gate is no longer open to the public, but it used to be the Kremlin's main entrance.

Saviour's Tower, once the main entrance to the Kremlin

Every person using Saviour's Gate, even the tsar, had to indicate respect for the icon by taking his hat off. The icon was removed after the Revolution.

Saviour's Tower was built in two stages. The lower part was designed by Italian architect Pietro Solario in 1491. Bazhen Ogurtsov and Englishman Christopher Galloway added the upper part and tent roof in 1625. Originally the chimes of the clock played the Preobrazhensky March and Kol' Slaven Nash Gospod' v Sione. Now they play the Russian National Anthem.

Completed in 1790, this Neo-Classical building was constructed to house several of the Senate's departments. Designed by Matvey Kazakov (see pp44–5), who regarded it as his best work, it is triangular, with a central, domed rotunda, from which the Russian flag flies.

KREMLIN TOWERS

There are 19 towers in the walls of the Kremlin, with a bridge leading from the Trinity Tower to a 20th, the Kutafya Tower. In 1935 the double-headed imperial eagles were removed from the five tallest towers and replaced two years later with stars made of red glass, each weighing between 1 and 1.5 tonnes.

From 1918 to 1991, the Senate housed the Soviet government. Lenin had his office here and his family lived in a flat on the top floor. During World War II the Red Army Supreme Command, headed by Stalin, was based in the building.

Today the Senate is the official seat of the president of the Russian Federation.

Peter the Great ordered the Arsenal to be built in 1701, but various setbacks, including a fire in 1711, delayed its completion until 1736. In 1812 the building was partly blown up by Napoleon's army (see pp23–5). Architects Aleksandr Bakarev, Ivan Tamanskiy, Ivan Mironovskiy and Evgraf Tyurin were commissioned to design a new Arsenal. Their attractive yellow and white Neo-Classical building was finished in 1828.

The Arsenal was constructed as a storehouse for weapons, ammunition and other military supplies. Around 750 cannons, including some that were captured from Napoleon's retreating troops, are lined up outside. Now the command post of the Kremlin guard, the interior and much of the exterior of the Arsenal are strictly out of bounds to visitors.

The Kremlin. Map 7 A1.

Designed by architect Osip Bove (see p45) in 1821, these gardens are named after Tsar Alexander I, who presided over the restoration of the city, including the Kremlin, after the Napoleonic Wars. Before the gardens were built, the Neglinnaya river, part of the Kremlin moat, was channelled underground. The only visible reminder of its presence is the stone bridge linking the Kutafya and Trinity towers.

In front of the Middle Arsenal Tower in the northern half of the gardens is an obelisk erected in 1913 to mark 300 years of the Romanov dynasty. The imperial eagle was taken down after the Revolution and the inscription was replaced by the names of revolutionary thinkers, such as Karl Marx and Friedrich Engels.

The Tomb of the Unknown Soldier, a short distance away, was unveiled in 1967. Its eternal flame was lit with a torch lit from the flame at the Field of Mars in St Petersburg. It burns for all the Russians who died in World War II. The body of a soldier is buried beneath the monument, which bears an inscription, "Your name is unknown, your deeds immortal".

In 1996, an huge shopping complex was constructed beneath Manezhnaya ploshchad, the large square to the north of Alexander Gardens.

ARBATSKAYA

The name "Arbat" is thought to derive from a Mongol word meaning suburb, and was first applied in the 15th century to the entire area west of the Kremlin, then inhabited by the tsar's artisans and equerries. Though still commemorated in street names, the artisans moved elsewhere in the late 18th century. The aristocracy moved in and were followed by Moscow's professionals, intellectuals and artists, attracted by the area's rambling backstreets, dilapidated cottages and overgrown courtyards. In the Old Arbat, with its pedestrianized main street, there are historic churches, timber houses and early 19th-century mansions around pereulok Sivtsev Vrazhek. Yet, not far away are the kiosks, cafés and huge Soviet-era apartment blocks and shops of the New Arbat.

GETTING THERE

This area is served by several metro stations: Arbatskaya, Biblioteka imeni Lenina, Borovitskaya, Kropotkinskaya and Smolenskaya. It is also easily accessible by trolleybus (1, 2, 5, 10, 15, 16, 31, 33, 39, 79, & B) and there are several buses that run through the district (6, 64, 132 & K).

Street-by-Street: Old Arbat

At the heart of the Old Arbat is the pedestrianized ulitsa Arbat. It is lined with antique shops, boutiques, souvenir stalls, pavement cafés and a variety of restaurants, from pizzerias and hamburger joints to lively examples of the traditional Russian pub (traktir). In the 19th century, the Old Arbat was the haunt of artists, musicians, poets, writers and intellectuals. Some of their homes have been preserved and opened as museums, and are among the district's many houses of that era that have been lovingly restored and painted in pastel shades of blue, green and ochre.

Today, pavement artists, buskers and street poets give it a renewed bohemian atmosphere.

The flat where the pianist and composer Aleksandr Skryabin (1872–1915) died, at the age of 43, has been preserved as it was when he lived there. Skryabin studied at the Moscow Conservatory (see p94), where he established an international reputation as a concert pianist. He was also a highly original composer and musical theorist, best known for his orchestral works such as Prometheus and A Poem of Ecstasy. Skryabin's music had a great influence on the young Igor Stravinsky (1882–1971), and leading composer Sergei Rachmaninov (1873–1943) was a regular visitor to his flat.

Although Skryabin spent much of his time abroad giving concerts, he was an aesthete and paid considerable attention to furnishing and decorating his fashionable apartment. The lofty rooms house his pianos, autographed manuscripts and Style-Moderne furniture. However, the most original item on show is a

The charms of the Old Arbat have been preserved in this secluded lane and the peaceful adjoining square, Spasopeskovskaya ploshchad.

In 1878, Vasilij Polenov painted A Moscow Courtyard, depicting Spasopeskovskaya ploshchad as a bucolic haven in the midst of the city.

Today the square still provides a respite from the hustle and bustle prevailing elsewhere.

At the centre of Polenov's picture, now in the Tretyakov Gallery (see pp118–21), is the white bell tower of the Church of the Saviour on the Sands (Tserkov Spas na Peskakh) from which the lane gets its name. This 18th-century church still dominates the square. In front of it is a small garden dedicated to the poet Alexander Pushkin.

The handsome Classical-style mansion standing on the far side of the square was built in 1913 as a private residence. Known as Spaso House, it has been the home of the US ambassador since 1933.

Krivoarbatskiy pereulok 10. Map 6 D1. M Smolenskaya. ☐ to public.

This unique house, almost hidden by office blocks, was designed by Konstantin Melnikov (1890–1974), one of Russia's greatest Constructivist architects (see p45), in 1927.

Made from brick overlaid with white stucco, the house consists of two interlocking cylinders. These are studded with rows of hexagonal windows, creating a curious honeycomb effect. A spiral staircase rises through the space where the cylinders overlap, linking the light, airy living spaces.

Melnikov's house was built for his family, but it was also to have been a prototype for future housing developments. However, his career was blighted when Stalin encouraged architects to adopt a new monumental style (see p45). Although he had won the Gold Medal at the Paris World's Fair in 1925, Melnikov's work was ridiculed or ignored. However, he did remain in his house for the rest of his life, one of the very few residents of central Moscow allowed to live in a privately built dwelling.

Melnikov's son, Viktor Melnikov, had a studio in the house until his death in 2006.

ALEXANDER PUSHKIN

Born in 1799 into Russia's aristocracy, Alexander Pushkin is Russia's most famous poet. He had established a reputation as both a poet and a rebel by the time he was 20. In 1820, he was sent into exile because the Tsarist government did not approve of his liberal verse, but eventually was set free.

Pushkin's early work consisted of narrative poems such as The Robber Brothers (1821), and his most famous work is Eugene Onegin (1823–30), a novel in verse. From 1830 Pushkin wrote mostly prose. He developed a unique style in pieces such as The Queen of Spades (1834) and is credited with giving Russian literature its own identity.

Alexander Pushkin rented this elegant, blue and white Empire-style flat for the first three months of his marriage to society beauty Natalya Goncharova. They were married in the Church of the Great Ascension on Bolshaya Nikitskaya ulitsa (see p93) in February 1831, when she was 18 years old. Pushkin wrote to his friend Pyotr Pletnev: "I am married – and happy. My only wish is that nothing in my life should change; I couldn't possibly expect anything better."

However, by May 1831

Pushkin had tired of life in Moscow, and the couple moved to St Petersburg, where sadly a tragic fate awaited him. Gossip began to circulate there that Pushkin's brother-in-law, a French officer called d'Anthès, was making advances to Natalya. Upon receiving letters informing him that he was now the "Grand Master to the Order of Cuckolds", Pushkin challenged d'Anthès to a duel. Mortally wounded in the contest, Pushkin died two days later.

The fascinating exhibition located in the museum's ground floor rooms gives an idea of what the city would have been like in the period when Pushkin was growing up, before the great fire of 1812. Among the prints, lithographs and watercolours are some unusual wax figures of a serf orchestra that belonged to the Goncharova family.

Pushkin and Natalya lived on the first floor. There are disappointingly few personal possessions here, although the poet's writing bureau and some family portraits are displayed. The atmosphere resembles a shrine more than a museum. Pushkin holds a special place in Russians' hearts and they treat his work and memory with reverence.

In the adjoining building to the Pushkin House-Museum is the childhood home of the symbolist writer Andrei Bely. Bely was born Boris Bugaev in 1880, but later adopted the name by which he is known as a writer. He grew up here

Only two rooms of the Bugaev family apartment have been preserved. A photographic exhibition on the writer's life and work is housed in one room. The most interesting item in the museum is the Line of Life, an illustration by Bely to show how his mood swings combined with cultural influences to direct his work.

Moscow's Aristocracy first settled in this street in the late 18th century and their elegant mansions still line it today. In Soviet times it was known as Kropotkinskaya ulitsa, after Prince Pyotr Kropotkin, a famous anarchist (see p23).

The Empire-style house at No.12 ulitsa Prechistenka is now the Pushkin Literary Museum (not to be confused with the Pushkin House-Museum, see p73). The house was originally designed for the Khrushchev family (no connection with Nikita Khrushchev) by Afanasiy Grigorev (see p45), one of the leading exponents of this style in Moscow. The building has a wooden frame, skilfully hidden by Classical columns and ornate stucco decoration.

Across the street another great writer is honoured at No. 11 in the Tolstoy Literary Museum. In contrast to the Tolstoy House-Museum (see p134), it concentrates on the man's work rather than his life. The building however, has no connection with Tolstoy; it was built in 1822, also to a design by Afanasiy Grigorev, for the noble Lopukhin family. On display are many letters, manuscripts and family portraits. At No. 20 is an elegant two-storey mansion decorated with eagles, urns, heraldic symbols and scallop shells. Until 1861 it was home to General Aleksey Yermolov, a commander-in-chief in the Russian army. After the Revolution, the American dancer Isadora Duncan and the poet Sergey Yesenin lived here during their brief, tempestuous marriage.

The two spoke no common language, and Yesenin stated his feelings by writing the Russian for "I love you" in lipstick on the bedroom mirror.

Cathedral of Christ the Redeemer ⑦

Храм Христа Спасителя
Khram Khrista Spasitelya

Ulitsa Volkhonka 15. Map 6 F2.
M Kropotkinskaya.

Rebuilding this cathedral, blown up on Stalin's orders in 1931, was the most ambitious of the construction projects undertaken by the enterprising mayor of Moscow, Yuriy Luzhkov. The basic structure of the new cathedral was built between 1994–97. For much of the intervening time, the site was occupied by an outdoor swimming pool, but this was eventually filled in.

The project courted controversy from the start, both on grounds of taste and cost. In 1995 a presidential decree declared that not a kopek of public money should be spent on it – funds were to be raised through donations from the public, the Russian Church and foreign donors among the big multinational companies operating in Russia. However, in practice, the better part of the total bill of over US$200 million came from the state budget, which raised objections at a time when Muscovites were suffering extreme poverty.

The original cathedral was built to commemorate the miraculous deliverance of Moscow from Napoleon's Grande Armée (see pp23–4). Begun in 1839, but not completed until 1883, it was designed by Konstantin Ton (see p45). The cathedral was the tallest building in Moscow at that time, the gilded dome rising to a height of 103 m (338 ft) and dominating the skyline for miles around. With a floor area of 9,000 sq m (97,000 sq ft), it could accommodate more than 10,000 worshippers.

In 1998, a small museum and a church on the ground floor opened to the public. There are spectacular views of the city from the dome.

STALIN'S PLAN FOR A PALACE OF SOVIETS

The original Cathedral of Christ the Redeemer was to have been replaced by a Palace of Soviets – a soaring tower, 315m (1,034 ft) high, topped by a 100-m (328-ft) statue of Lenin. It was designed as the highlight of Stalin's reconstruction of Moscow, much of the rest of which was realized: broad boulevards, skyscrapers and the metro system (see pp38–41) are now familiar features of the city. The result was also, however, the destruction of many supposedly unnecessary buildings, especially churches and monasteries, even inside the Kremlin. The scheme for the Palace of Soviets was eventually abandoned and the cathedral was rebuilt in the 1990s.

Artist's impression of Stalin's proposed awe-inspiring Palace of Soviets is thought probably to have been Vasilii Bazhenov (see p44), to surpass himself with the grandeur of the design. The mansion's height was achieved by placing it on an enormous stone base and the building is surmounted by a beautifully proportioned rotunda. Surprisingly the most impressive façade is to the rear of the building, which originally led to a garden. The original main entrance is through an ornate stone gateway located on Starovagankovskiy pereulok.

In 1839, a relative of Captain Pashkov sold the house to the Moscow Institute for Nobles, which occupied the premises until 1861. It was then taken over by the Rumyantsev Museum, which moved to the capital from St Petersburg at that time. The museum brought with it an art collection and a library of more than one million volumes.

After the Revolution, the library was nationalized and renamed the Lenin Library. A new, and infinitely less attractive, extension for the rapidly expanding book collection was begun next door in 1928 and completed during the 1950s. Now known as the Russian State Library, it contains some 40 million items including books, periodicals, manuscripts, recordings, microfilms and pictures.

Founded in 1898, the Pushkin Museum houses an excellent collection of French Impressionist and Post-Impressionist paintings. It also has an enviable collection of old masters. Following the collapse of the Soviet Union (see pp30–31), the curators admitted that they had countless works of art hidden away for ideological reasons. Some of these are now on show, including paintings by Russian-born artists Vasily Kandinsky and Marc Chagall. The museum building was designed by Roman Klein. It was originally built to house plaster casts of classical sculptures for Moscow University art students to use for research.

The accumulated treasures of the Pushkin Museum of Fine Arts reflect the tastes of many private collectors, whose holdings were nationalized by the Soviet government after the Revolution. The most important of these belonged to two outstanding connoisseurs, Sergey Shchukin and Ivan Morozov. By 1914, Shchukin had acquired more than 220 paintings by French artists, including many by Cézanne. Even more importantly, Shchukin championed Matisse and Picasso when they were still relatively unknown.

Morozov also collected canvases by these two painters along with pictures by Renoir, Van Gogh and Gauguin.

EUROPEAN ART 13TH–16TH CENTURIES

The Pushkin Museum contains a small, but memorable, collection of Medieval and Renaissance art. It includes a series of altar panels painted in the Byzantine tradition by Italian artists. Siena was a major artistic centre in the 14th century and Simone Martini was a leading master of the Siennese school. His naturalistic images of St Augustine and Mary Magdalene, painted in the 1320s, are among the exhibits.

There are also a number of later religious pieces on show, including a triptych by Pietro di Giovanni Lianori. Two outstanding old masters painted in the 1490s are also displayed here: the superb Annunciation, painted by Sandro Botticelli, and the Madonna and Child by Pietro Perugino.

The museum is not so well endowed with German and Flemish art of the period. However, two notable exceptions are Pieter Breughel the Younger's Winter Landscape with Bird Trap and Lucas Cranach the Elder's Virgin and Child. Painted on wood, the latter places the Virgin and Child in the context of a typical German landscape.

EUROPEAN ART 17TH–18TH CENTURIES

The Pushkin Museum has an enviable collection of 17th-century Dutch and Flemish masters. It includes Anthony Van Dyck's accomplished portraits of the wealthy burgher, Adriaen Stevens, and his wife, Maria Boschaert, both painted in 1629, and some evocative landscapes by Jan Van Goyen and Jacob van Ruysdael. Also on show are still lifes by Frans Snyders, some delightful genre scenes by Jan Steen, Pieter de Hooch and Gabriel Metsu and several works by Peter Paul Rubens, including the characteristically flamboyant and sensual Bacchanalia (c.1615).

Six of Rembrandt's masterly canvases, along with some of his drawings and etchings, are displayed in the gallery. The paintings include the biblical Abasuerus, Haman and Esther (1660), Christ Driving the Money-Changers from the Temple (1626) and An Old Woman, a sensitive portrait of the artist's mother (1654).

The gallery has a modest collection of Spanish and Italian paintings from the 17th and 18th centuries. Of the Spanish artists, Bartholomé Esteban Murillo, known for his religious scenes and portraits, is probably the best known. The works on show by Italian artists include Betrothal of the Doge and the Sea (1729–30) by

Canaletto, widely considered the master of the style of urban landscape known as veduta.

The Pushkin Museum is justly famous for its collection of French art, which includes paintings of classical and epic subjects by a variety of artists. Among the paintings on show are Nicolas Poussin's dramatic work, The Battle of the Israelites with the Amorri (c.1625) and François Boucher's painting, Hercules and Omphale (1730s). The latter depicts the myth of Hercules, who was sold as a slave to Queen Omphale.

EUROPEAN ART 19TH CENTURY

In the early 19th century Classicism in art gradually yielded to Romanticism. Works such as After the Shipwreck (1847) by Eugène Delacroix, which portrays the sea as a force of nature, unpredictable and hostile to man, were the result of this shift. Works by other artists of the period, such as the landscape painters John Constable and Caspar David Friedrich, are also on show.

The Pushkin Museum has a fine collection of paintings by artists of the French Barbizon school, who were the predecessors of the Impressionists. These include landscapes by Camille Corot, François Millet and Gustave Courbet.

Paintings from the enormous collection of works by the Impressionists themselves are displayed in rotation. Visitors can look forward to a selection of canvases by artists such as Edouard Manet, Edgar Degas, Pierre Auguste Renoir and Claude Monet. The museum owns eleven paintings by Monet, including Lilac in the Sun (1873) and two from a series of 20 paintings of the cathedral at Rouen. There are also some excellent paintings by Renoir including Nude and the radiant Portrait of the Actress Jeanne Samary (1877). Alongside landscapes and street scenes by Alfred Sisley and Camille Pissarro are Blue Dancers (c.1899) and Dancers at a Rehearsal (1875–77), two of Degas' many ballet scenes.

Sculptures by Auguste Rodin are also part of the collection. They include a bust of Victor Hugo and preparatory studies for the famous Kiss (1886) and Burghers of Calais (1884–6).

POST-IMPRESSIONIST AND 20TH-CENTURY EUROPEAN ART

Post-Impressionism is the term generally used to describe the various styles of painting developed by the generation of artists that came after the Impressionists. This school includes Vincent Van Gogh, Paul Cézanne and Paul Gauguin.

Improvisation No 20 by Vasily Kandinsky

A marvellous array of paintings by Paul Cézanne is on show in the gallery, including his Self-portrait (early 1880s), Pierrot and Harlequin (1888) and a late version of Mont Ste-Victoire (1905). His Pierrot and Harlequin (1888) depicts characters from the Mardi-Gras Carnivals.

In 1888, Paul Gauguin stayed with Van Gogh for two months in Arles. Gauguin's Café in Arles and Van Gogh's intense Red Vineyards in Arles, both painted during the visit, hang in the Pushkin Museum.

The gallery also has several later works by Van Gogh, including The Prison Courtyard (1890) and Wheatfields in Auvers, After the Rain (1890). His Portrait of Dr Rey (1889) emphasizes the sympathetic nature of the doctor who showed so much kindness to the sick artist.

In 1891 Gauguin moved to Tahiti and a number of works from this period, including Are You Jealous? (1892) and The Great Buddha (1899), are also displayed here.

Some of Henri Matisse's greatest masterpieces are in the Pushkin Museum, including The Painter's Studio (1911) and Goldfish (1911). There are also over 50 paintings by Matisse's friend, Pablo Picasso, including Young Acrobat on a Ball, painted in 1905, (see p48) and Harlequin and His Companion, dating from 1901.

A number of other 20th-century artists are also represented in the collection. Highlights include The Artist and his Bride (1980) by Marc Chagall and the abstract Improvisation No. 20 by Vasily Kandinsky.

An enormous 18th-century mansion houses this museum dedicated to Russian architecture. It is named after the Soviet architect Aleksey Shchusev (see p45), who carried out parts of Stalin's reconstruction of Moscow during the 1930s and also designed the monumental Lenin Mausoleum (see p107).

The museum once occupied the whole building, with beautiful displays covering the Various temporary exhibitions are on show throughout the year displaying different aspects of Russian architecture and architects.

A chaotic mass of kiosks, traffic and underpasses, Arbat Square is the link between the vividly contrasting areas of Old and New Arbat. Beneath the square, the underpasses contain a society of their own. Expect to come across an impromptu rock concert, kittens and puppies for sale and, in late summer, children selling bulbous, hand-picked mushrooms (though buying these may not be advisable).

On the corner of ulitsa Arbat is the yellow wedge-shaped Praga restaurant (see p184), dating from before the Revolution, but reconstructed in 1954. Despite still retaining the elegance of its dining halls, it became a fairly uninspiring snack-bar during the later Soviet era. However, it has now been entirely refurbished to re-emerge as a very elegant establishment serving high-quality cuisine in a variety of national styles.

The small white building at the other end of the underpass dates from 1909, but it was redesigned three years later by Fyodor Shekhtel (see p45) for the pioneering Russian film studio boss, Aleksandr Khanzhonkov. Now known as the Arts Cinema (see p201), it was one of the first cinemas to open in Moscow.

A portrait of the poet and novelist Lermontov (1814–41) as a child

Tucked away behind the tower blocks of the New Arbat is the modest timber house that was once home to Mikhail Lermontov. The great Romantic poet and novelist lived here with his grandmother, Yelizaveta Arseneva, from 1829–32 while he was a student at Moscow University. While here, he wrote an early draft of his narrative poem The Demon (1839).

Lermontov was more interested in writing poetry than in his studies and left university without graduating. He then became a guardsman. However, he was exiled to the Caucasus for a year because of the bitter criticisms of the authorities expressed in his poem Death of a Poet (1837). This poem about the death of Pushkin (see p73) marked a turning point in Lermontov's writing and is generally agreed to be the first of his mature works. His most famous composition, the novel A Hero of our Time, was written in 1840. Lermontov died the next year, aged only 26. Like Pushkin, he was killed in a duel.

There are only five rooms in the museum, but each bears testament both to Lermontov's dazzling intellectual gifts and also to his zest for life. The study on the mezzanine was his favourite room. Here he would play the guitar, piano and violin, and even compose music.

The drawing room, which still contains many of its original furnishings, was often the site of lively dancing, singing and masquerades.

Many of Lermontov's manuscripts are on display downstairs, together with drawings and watercolours, some by Lermontov himself.

A stone bust and inscription outside a yellow Empire-style mansion record that one of the greatest opera singers of the 20th century once lived here. The renowned Russian bass, Fyodor Shalyapin, occupied this large house from 1910 until he emigrated from Soviet Russia in 1922.

Born in Kazan in 1873, Shalyapin began his career in great poverty, working as a stevedore on the Volga before his unique vocal talent was discovered. He made his international debut at La Scala, Milan, in 1901, and went on to sing a variety of the great operatic bass roles, including Don Quixote, Ivan the Terrible and Boris Godunov.

Shalyapin died in Paris in 1938, but his remains have since been returned to Russia and were reburied in the Novodevichiy Cemetery (see p131) alongside other famous Russians.

This is one of Moscow's newer house-museums and one of the best. Amusing drawings of Shalyapin by his children and a china doll bought in France decorate the green-upholstered sitting room. The mementos in the blue study, meanwhile, include portraits of the singer in his various operatic roles.

The carved chair in front of the dining room stove was a gift from writer Maxim Gorky (see p95), while the paintings on the walls are by the artist Konstantin Korovin.

The heavily labelled trunks stored in the box room are a reminder that Shalyapin was also in great demand at opera houses abroad. Other items on display in the house include the singer's make-up table and one of his wigs. In the concert room visitors can listen to recordings of Shalyapin at work. After singing for his guests, Shalyapin would often take them next door for a game of billiards. Shalyapin was not a very good loser and, depending on his mood, his wife would only invite friends with grace enough to let him win.

TVERSKAYA

At heart a commercial district, Tverskaya centres on the road of the same name, which originally led to St Petersburg and was the processional route used by the tsars. Now Moscow's premier shopping street, Tverskaya ulitsa underwent a major redevelopment in the 1930s during the huge reconstruction of Moscow ordered by Stalin (see p75). At that time many buildings were torn down so that the street could be widened and massive new apartment blocks were erected for workers. These looming grey buildings make the street a showcase of the monumental style of architecture (see p45) favoured by Stalin. The area's surprisingly tranquil backstreets have been home to many famous artists, writers and actors, and, despite Stalin's best efforts, still have some interesting pre-Revolutionary houses.

Street-by-Street: Around Theatre Square

Moscow's Theatreland is centred, quite appropriately, around Theatre Square. Dominating the square is one of the most famous opera and ballet stages in the world, the Bolshoy Theatre. The Malyy (Small) Theatre is on the east side of the square, while the Russian Academic Youth Theatre is on the west. Further to the west is the city's main shopping street, Tverskaya ulitsa, and two more theatres, the Yermolova Theatre and the Moscow Arts Theatre. There are also several excellent restaurants and bars in this lively neighbourhood.

Yuriy Dolgorukiy, Moscow's founder (see p17), is depicted in this statue. It was unveiled in 1954, seven years after the city's 800th anniversary.

The Hotel Metropol, built by William Walcot and Lev Kekushev in 1899–1905, is a fine example of Style-Moderne architecture (see p45). The exterior walls sport a number of ceramic panels, including Mikhail Vruble's large work at the top of the façade. Called The Daydreaming Princess, it is based on scenes from the play La Princesse Loïtaine, written in 1895 by Edmond Rostand, author of Cyrano de Bergerac. The building also has ornate wrought-iron balconies and a superb painted glass roof in its Metropol Zal restaurant.

Over the years the Metropol has welcomed guests as varied and famous as Irish dramatist George Bernard Shaw and American pop star Michael Jackson.

This Elegant Square is named after the theatres on three of its sides. Originally this area was marshy ground, regularly flooded by the Neglinnaya river. In the 1820s it was paved over and the square was laid out to a design by Osip Bove (see p45). In 1839–1911 a military parade ground occupied part of the square. Today, Theatre Square is dominated by the Bolshoy Theatre.

On the square's east side is a converted private mansion that houses the Malyy (Small) Theatre (see p200). The Malyy is particularly associated with playwright Aleksandr Ostrovskiy (1823–86), whose satirical plays were performed here. A sombre statue of him by Nikolay Andreev was erected in the forecourt in 1929.

The Russian Academic Youth Theatre (see p199), with its elaborate Neo-Classical porch, stands on the square's west side. Originally designed by Osip Bove (see p45), it was almost entirely rebuilt by Boris Freidenberg in 1882. The theatre has occupied this building since 1936.

To the northwest of Theatre Square is the Operetta Theatre (see p200). In the 1890s the private opera company of the wealthy industrialist and arts patron Savva Mamontov (1842–1914) performed here. The careers of opera singer Fyodor Shalyapin (see p83), composer Sergei Rachmaninov and artist Vasily Polenov, who designed sets and costumes, all began here with Mamontov's company.

In the centre of the square is a granite statue of Karl Marx. Sculpted in 1961 by Leonid Kerbel, it bears the words "Workers of the world unite!"

This green and white Neo-Classical mansion was originally built in the first half of the 18th century. In the early 1780s, it was bought by a group of Moscow nobles who commissioned architect Matvey Kazakov (see pp44–5) to turn it into a noblemen's club. Kazakov added a number of rooms to the existing building including the magnificent ballroom, known as the Hall of Columns. It was here, in 1856, that Tsar Alexander II addressed an audience of the Russian nobility on the need to emancipate the serfs.

After the Revolution, trade unions took over the building, hence its current name. In 1924 the hall was opened to the public for more than a million people to file past Lenin's open coffin. Many of his closest colleagues, members of the guard of honour on that occasion, were later tried here during the show trials of 1936–8 (see p27). Stalin, who was behind these travesties of justice, also lay in state here in 1953.

Nowadays the House of Unions is used for concerts and public meetings.

This features factory chimneys belching smoke, oil derricks, electricity pylons, railway engines and tractors.

The National's most famous guest was Lenin, who stayed in room 107 at the hotel for a week, in March 1918, before he moved to the Kremlin.

Tverskaya Ulitsa was the grandest thoroughfare in Moscow in the 19th century, when it was famous for its restaurants, theatres, hotels and purveyors of French fashions. Stalin's reconstruction of the city in the 1930s resulted in Tverskaya ulitsa being widened by 42 m (138 ft) and its name being changed to ulitsa Gorkovo to commemorate the writer Maxim Gorky. Many buildings were torn down to make way for huge apartment blocks to house party bureaucrats, such as those at Nos. 9–11. Other buildings were rebuilt further back to stand on the new, wider road. Now called Tverskaya ulitsa again, the street carries a huge volume of traffic. However, it is still one of the city's most popular places to eat out and shop.

At No.7 is the Central Telegraph Office, a severe grey building with an illuminated globe outside. It was designed by Ilya Rerberg in 1927. Through the arch on the other side of the road is a green-tiled building with floral friezes and tent-roofed turrets. Built in 1905, this was the Moscow mission of the Savvinskiy Monastery. It is now luxury flats and offices.

Further up the street is the soulless Tverskaya square, dominated by an equestrian statue of Moscow's founder, Prince Yuriy Dolgorukiy (see p86). On the west side of the square looms the red and white city hall. Designed in 1782 by Matvey Kazakov (see pp44–5), it was the residence of the governor-general before the Revolution and later became the Moscow City Soviet or town hall. In 1944–6 extra storeys were added, more than doubling its height.

Beyond Tverskaya square, at No. 14, is Moscow's most famous delicatessen. Now known by its pre-Revolutionary name, Yeliseev's Food Hall (see p194), in Soviet times it was called Gastronom No.1. In the 1820s this mansion was the home of Princess Zinaida Volkonskaya, whose soirées were attended by great figures of the day, including Alexander Pushkin (see p73). In 1898 Grigoriy Yeliseev bought the building, and had it lavishly redecorated with stained-glass windows, crystal chandeliers, carved pillars, polished wood counters and large mirrors. It now stocks a wide range of imported and Russian delicacies.

Home to one of the oldest, and probably the most famous, ballet companies in the world, the Bolshoy Theatre is also one of Moscow's major landmarks. The first Bolshoy Theatre opened in 1780 and presented masquerades, comedies and comic operas. It burnt down in 1805, but its successor was completed in 1825 to a design by Osip Bove (see p45) and Andrey Mikhaylov. This building too was destroyed by fire, in 1853, but the essentials of its highly praised design were retained in Albert Kavos' reconstruction of 1856. The theatre is currently closed for renovations; performances are now being staged at the Bolshoy Small Stage opposite.

THE BOLSHOY BALLET IN THE SOVIET ERA

In the 1920s and 1930s new ballets conforming to Revolutionary ideals were created for the Bolshoy, but the company's heyday was in the 1950s and 1960s. Ballets such as Spartacus were produced and the dancers toured abroad for the first time to widespread acclaim. Yet a number of dancers also defected to the West in this period, in protest at the company's harsh management and a lack of artistic freedom.

The first ever performance at the Moscow Arts Theatre (MKhAT) took place in 1898. The theatre was founded by a group of young enthusiasts, led by the directors Konstantin Stanislavskiy and Vladimir Nemirovich-Danchenko. The MKhAT company had an early success with their production of Anton Chekhov's play The Seagull in the theatre's first year. When the play had been performed three years earlier in St Petersburg, it had been a disastrous flop but, performed using Stanislavskiy's new Method acting, it was extremely well received.

In 1902 architect Fyodor Shekhtel (see p45) completely reconstructed the interior of the theatre, adding innovations such as a central lighting box and a revolving stage. The auditorium had very little decoration, so that audiences were forced to concentrate on the performance.

The theatre continued to flourish after the Revolution, but its repertoire was restricted by state censorship. Most of the plays produced were written by Maxim Gorky, whose work was in favour with the government. The frustrations and compromises of the period were brilliantly satirized in the 1930s by Mikhail Bulgakov (who also worked as an assistant director in the theatre) in his novel Teatralnyy Roman. These problems continued and in the 1980s part of the company moved to the Gorky Arts Theatre on Tverskoy bulvar.

Today a variety of productions are staged at the Moscow Arts Theatre, including many of Anton Chekhov's plays.

In the 1920s new apartments here were assigned to the staff of the Moscow state theatres.

No. 17 was the home of two actors from the Moscow Arts Theatre, Vasily Kachalov and Ivan Moskvin.

No. 12 was home to the avant-garde director Vsevolod Meyerhold, who directed premieres of Vladimir Mayakovsky's satires. He lived here from 1928 until his arrest in 1939 at the height of Stalin's Great Purge (see p27).

The Composers' Union was at Nos. 8–10. It was here that composers Sergey Prokofiev and Dmitriy Shostakovich were forced to read an apology for works that deviated from Socialist Realism (see p135).

About halfway along Bryusov pereulok is the 17th-century single-domed Church of the Resurrection. This was one of the few churches to remain open during the Soviet era.

This 18th-century mansion was the home of the great director and actor Konstantin Stanislavskiy. He lived on the first floor from 1920 until he died in 1938, at the age of 75.

Stanislavskiy found himself disillusioned with the conservative ethos of the old Moscow Theatre School, and created an outlet for his innovative ideas by founding the Moscow Arts Theatre (MKhAT) in 1898. After moving into this flat, he converted his ballroom into a makeshift theatre where he rehearsed his experimental Opera Dramatic Group. Later, when he was too ill to go out, he also held rehearsals here for the MKhAT company.

Stanislavskiy's living room and study, the dining room and the bedroom of his wife, Maria Lilina, are all open. Also on display are an early Edison phonograph and a vase that was a gift from the dancer Isadora Duncan. Downstairs are props and costumes from Stanislavskiy's productions.

Konstantin Stanislavskiy's successful production of Anton Chekhov's The Seagull took the theatre world by storm. Stanislavskiy's secret was his new school of Method acting, in which performers explored their characters' inner motives. Stanislavskiy and Chekhov collaborated on the premieres of other Chekhov plays and the success of the productions was such that their names have been linked ever since.

blue façade was reconstructed following the great fire of 1812 (see pp24–5). The Neo-Classical rear façade, which survived the fire, dates from around 1775.

Just opposite the Moscow Conservatory (see p94), is the attractive white Church of the Little Ascension. Built around the end of the 16th century, it was restored in 1739 following a fire. Behind it is the Gothic tower of St Andrew's Anglican Church. It was built for Moscow's English community in 1882 by British architect Richard Freeman.

The heavily ornamented red-brick building at Nos. 19–20 was once called the Paradise Theatre. It was renamed the Mayakovsky Theatre after the poet Vladimir Mayakovsky (see p111). His plays Bath House and The Bed Bug were premiered here in 1928 and 1929, directed by avant-garde director Vsevolod Meyerhold. One of the greatest innovators of his era, Meyerhold was executed by the State in 1940, largely because his work did not agree with the canons of Socialist Realism (see p135).

Opposite is the Church of the Great Ascension. Begun in 1798, it was rebuilt after the 1812 fire. Alexander Pushkin (see p73) married Natalya Goncharova here in 1831.

The largest music school in Russia, the Moscow Conservatory was founded in 1866 by Nikolay Rubinstein, the brother of composer and pianist Anton Rubinstein.

One of the Conservatory's teachers was the young Pyotr Tchaikovsky, who taught here until 1878. On the forecourt is his statue, wielding a baton despite the fact that Tchaikovsky detested conducting. The work of Vera Mukhina, it dates from 1954. The pattern on the forecourt railings is made up of the opening notes from some of Tchaikovsky's works.

Portraits of famous composers adorn the walls of the light, airy Bolshoy Zal (Great Hall). Used for concerts since 1898, it is also the setting for the prestigious Tchaikovsky International Competition (see p200). The Conservatory has a small museum that is open during performances.

The Conservatory has always been an important training ground for young Russian composers and performers. Among its best-known alumni are pianist-composers Sergei Rachmaninov and Aleksandr Skryabin (see p72). Dmitriy Shostakovich, the great Soviet composer, lived nearby, at the Composers' Union on Bryusov pereulok (see p92). He taught at the Conservatory from 1942 until he fell from favour and was sacked six years later for "professional incompetence" during Stalin's Purges (see p27).

The Manège was originally built in 1817 as a military parade ground to a design by General Augustin de Béthencourt. The 45-m- (148-ft-) wide roof had no supporting columns, leaving an uninterrupted floor space large enough for an infantry regiment to practise in.

In 1823–5 Osip Bove (see p45) added a colonnade and decorative frieze to the exterior.

The Manège became the Central Exhibition Hall in 1957 and it was at an exhibition here in 1962 that Nikita Khrushchev (see p30) famously condemned abstract art. The brunt of the attack was borne by the sculptor Ernst Neizvestniy but, curiously, in his will Khrushchev chose Neizvestniy to design his tombstone (see p131). Fire all but destroyed the building in 2004 but it was swiftly rebuilt. Today the Manège is still mostly used to house exhibitions.

Vladimir Mazyrin designed it at the end of the 19th century for the playboy Arseny Morozov, a member of the wealthy Morozov family (see p96). The interior is as showy as the façade. Its rooms include a Greek atrium and a hunting hall filled with carved animal heads. The only way to see inside is to attend a concert or lecture held here. In Soviet times the mansion was used by the Union of Friendship Societies, hence its name.

A frieze of Irises against a background of blue and purple clouds runs round the top of the yellow glazed-brick walls of this extraordinary mansion.

Fyodor Shekhtel designed this masterpiece of Style-Moderne architecture (see p45) in 1900. The house belonged to arts patron and millionaire banker Stepan Ryabushinskiy until he left Russia with his family after the Revolution. In 1931 Stalin presented the mansion as a gift to the famous socialist writer Maxim Gorky.

The interior of the house is spectacular, featuring ceilings with elaborate mouldings, stained-glass windows and carved door frames. However, the pièce de résistance is the flowing staircase of polished Estonian limestone, which ends lamp resembling a jellyfish.

By the time Gorky moved to this house, his career as a novelist and playwright was in decline. While living here, he wrote only one play, Yegor Bulychev and Others (1932), and part of a novel, The Life of Klim Samgin (unfinished at his death). However his fame and his earlier support for the Bolshevik Party made him a useful propaganda tool for the Soviet government. He served this function by being presi-dent of the Union of Writers, which explains why the rooms are full of photos of the author in the company of aspiring dramatists, Young Pioneers and ambitious Communist officials.

On display are Gorky's hat, overcoat and walking stick, his remarkable collection of oriental carvings and many of his letters and books, including some first editions.

Shortly after Gorky died in 1936, Genrikh Yagoda, the former head of the NKVD (secret police), was accused of murdering him. Although the charge was probably fabricated, Yagoda was found guilty in one of the last of the notorious show trials (see p27). Rumours persist that Gorky was killed on Stalin's orders.

Anton Chekhov (1860–1904) lived in this two-storey house in 1886–90. It was later refurbished in consultation with the author's widow, actress Olga Knipper-Chekhova, and opened as a museum in 1954. However, it is only partially successful in recreating a period feeling and contains few of Chekhov's possessions.

Chekhov was a qualified doctor and was practising medicine when he lived here, as the brass plate by the front door testifies. He shared the house with his parents, his brother, Mikhail, and his sister, Mariya. As the family's main breadwinner, Chekhov could only write in his spare time, but it was here that he created his first major play, Ivanov. He also wrote many short stories and several one-act plays here.

Exhibits in the study, which doubled as a consulting room, include Chekhov's doctor's bag, manuscripts and pictures, including some of him with Leo Tolstoy (see p134).

Upstairs are a richly decorated living room and Mariya's room, which, in some ways, is the most attractive in the house. Its furnishings include a sewing machine, ornaments and embroidered tablecloths.

There is also an exhibition about Chekhov's later career as a playwright (see p93), which includes adverts for his plays and first editions of his works.

A pair of stone lions guards this elegant red mansion, built in the late 18th century. The wings and Empire-style façade (see p45) were added some decades later. In 1831 the mansion became a gentlemen's club, known as the English Club, and until the Revolution, the Muscovite aristocracy drank and gambled here.

Ironically, this building, with all its aristocratic associations, became the Museum of the Revolution. However, since the Soviet Union broke up in 1991, the collections display a more objective view of 20th-century Russian history; the name of the museum has also been changed to reflect this shift.

Laid out chronologically, the exhibits cover 1900–91. They include home-made grenades, a Maxim gun on a converted carriage (used in the Civil War), sweet wrappers depicting Marx and Lenin and former premier Nikita Khrushchev's hat and camera from his 1959 trip to the United States. The collection of so-called propaganda porcelain and a display of gifts presented to Soviet rulers are also interesting.

The bronze statue of poet Alexander Pushkin was unveiled in the presence of two other Russian literary giants, Fyodor Dostoevsky and Ivan Turgenev, in 1880. The statue, located on the south side of Pushkin Square, was sculpted by Alexander Opekushin.

Pushkin has long epitomized the spirit of freedom in Russia and the statue occasionally became a rallying point for demonstrations in the 1960s and 1970s, which sometimes ended in clashes between the KGB and demonstrators.

Before the Revolution Pushkin Square was called Strastnaya ploschad (Passion Square) after the 17th-century Convent of the Passion which used to stand here. The convent was demolished in 1935 to make way for the monstrous Rossiya cinema (see p201).

Just beyond the cinema, on Malaya Dmitrovka ulitsa, is the Church of the Nativity of the Virgin in Putinki. Built in 1649–52, this attractive church has clustered tent roofs, tiered kokosbniki gables (see p44) and blue onion domes.

RED SQUARE AND KITAY GOROD

Moscow's first suburb, Kitay Gorod, was settled as early as the 12th century by tradesmen and artisans employed by the tsar. The word kitay is thought to refer to the wattle used to build the ramparts around the suburb. Red Square was created as a market square beside the Kremlin (see pp52–67) in the late 15th century. Behind it, trading rows were set up, each line of wooden cabins specializing in a particular item, such as icons, pans or hats. In the 16th century, a number of boyars (see p20), including Russia's future rulers, the Romanovs, built their estates nearby, while the presence of merchants from Novgorod and as far away as England was actively encouraged. Later, in the 19th century, Kitay Gorod became Moscow's financial district, home to the Stock Exchange and major banks.

Commerce and religion go hand-in-hand in this ancient part of the city. The heart of Moscow's financial district is Birzhevaya ploshchad, and the surrounding area has been home to traders for centuries. Among the banks and offices are an increasing number of up-market stores, especially lining Nikolskaya ulitsa, and the area now rivals Russia's best-known shopping arcade, GUM (see p107). At one time there were more than 40 churches and monasteries dotted about these narrow streets. Only around a dozen have survived and most of these are now undergoing painstaking restoration.

Ulitsa Varvarka

Map 7 B1–C1.  Kitay Gorod.

The heart of the former merchants' quarter of Zaryade, ulitsa Varvarka is one of Moscow's oldest streets. It is named after the original Church of St Barbara (Varvara) the Martyr. This earlier building was demolished in 1796 to make way for a new pink and white Neo-Classical church of the same name, designed by Rodion Kazakov.

A little further along is the single-domed Church of St Maxim the Blessed. Built by traders from Novgorod to house the bones of St Maxim, it was consecrated in 1698. Between the two churches stands the Old English Court.

Across the road are the Old Merchants' Chambers (Staryy gostinnyy dvor), which are fronted by a row of Corinthian columns. Italian architect Giacomo Quarenghi drew up plans for this market in 1790, and the work was supervised by Moscow architects Semen Karin and Ivan Selekhev. There are shops here and performances and exhibitions are held in the covered yard. Beyond the Church of St Maxim are the 17th-century Monastery of the Sign and the Palace of the Romanov Boyars.

At the end of ulitsa Varvarka is the Church of St George, built in 1657–8 by merchants from Pskov, a town known

In 1553, while searching the northern coast of Russia for a passage to the east, the English merchant adventurer Richard Chancellor (see p21) was shipwrecked. He was taken to Moscow and received by Ivan the Terrible, whose desire to trade with England later led him to propose marriage to Queen Elizabeth I. On returning to Russia in 1556, Chancellor and his trading mission were given this large property in Zaryade. It was to serve as a storage and trading house and as accommodation for English merchants.

In the mid-17th century, the estate passed into Russian hands and by the 1900s it had been extensively altered. After the Revolution (see pp26–9), the house was restored. It later reopened as a museum during the official visit of Queen Elizabeth II to Russia in 1994.

Inside, an exhibition highlights the history of the Old English Court and its role in developing Anglo-Russian relations. Winding stone staircases lead down to the cellars and the official chamber used for negotiations and functions. Only the upper storeys of this palace can be seen from ulitsa Varvarka. This is largely because the palace is built on a steep slope leading away from the street down towards the Moskva river.

The palace was originally built by the boyar (see p20) Nikita Romanov in the 16th century. It was home to the Romanovs until 1613 when

A view along ulitsa Varvarka, with the Old English Court straight ahead Mikhail Romanov (see p19) became tsar and the family moved to the Kremlin. The palace has been protected as a museum since 1859.

The main entrance is reached via a courtyard; a double-headed eagle, the Romanov family crest, adorns the archway leading to the courtyard.

The ground and first floors of the palace probably date from the 17th century. In the painted hall, personal effects of the early Romanovs are displayed, including gold dishes, ancient title deeds, ledgers inlaid with precious gems and the robes of Nikita's eldest son, Patriarch Fyodor Filaret. The rooms have been refurbished in the lavish style of the period, with walls covered in gilt-embossed leather or painted in rich reds, greens and golds.

In the 16th and 17th centuries even the richest families had to tolerate rather cramped and dim conditions. The portals in the palace are so low that a man of average height has to stoop, and little light is let in by the windows as they are made of mica, a translucent mineral, rather than glass.

In the mid-19th century the light and airy, wooden upper storey was added to the building. The main hall on this level has a beautifully carved wooden ceiling. An anteroom has a display of embroidery.

The vaulted cellars are the least interesting rooms of the museum and contain an odd mix of baskets, trunks and kitchen equipment.

Like the churches on ulitsa Varvarka, this marvellous church is dwarfed by monstrous post-war buildings that were formerly Communist Party offices. When it was founded in 1635 by the wealthy merchant, Grigoriy Nikitnikov, the church would have dominated the local skyline. It is at present closed while it is being restored.

The church has five green domes, a profusion of decoration and painted tiles, and tiers of kokoshniki gables (see p44). The equally elaborate tent-roofed bell tower, which is linked to the main building by an enclosed gallery, was added shortly after the church was finished.

The Church of the Trinity is famous for its frescoes, which were finished in 1656, shortly after Nikitnikov died from the plague. They portray scenes from the Gospels, such as The Parable of the Rich Man, in direct, emotional terms.

Among the artists who made an important contribution to the church's decoration was the great fresco and icon painter Semen Ushakov. He Painted a number of the frescoes and several of the panels in the splendid gilded iconostasis. Among his works is the Annunciation of the Virgin, which can be seen to the left of the Royal Gate (see p61) on the iconostasis.

Улица Ильинка

Map 7 B1. M Kitay Gorod.

In the 19th century this narrow but majestic street was the commercial heart of Kitay Gorod, and home to numerous banks and trading offices. Their richly decorated façades were intended to impress and are still the chief pleasure of a stroll along the street. Today, ulitsa Ilinka is once more the location of a number of commercial and financial institutions, including the Ministry of Finance.

The name Ilinka refers to the former Ilnskiy Monastery, of which no traces now remain. The monastery once stood where the 17th-century Church of St Elijah can now be seen, at No. 3. Further along, at No. 6, on the corner of Birzhevaya ploshchad, is a peach-coloured building with a Neo-Classical portico, which at present houses the Russian Chamber of Industry and Commerce. Originally these were the premises of Moscow's Stock Exchange, which was rebuilt by Aleksandr Kamenskiy in 1873–5, having first opened in 1836. At that time many of Moscow's merchants still wore long patriarchal beards and the traditional kaftan, and were used to dealing with one another in the street. They at first refused to enter the new Stock Exchange and, in the end, were coralled into the building by the police.

Across the street from this building is the former Trinity Sergius Hostel, which was the city mission of the Trinity Monastery of St Sergius (see pp162–5). Now part of the Russian Supreme Court, it was built by Pavel Skomoroshenko in 1876 and is a restrained example of the Russian-Revival style (see p45).

A building which formerly served as offices for the Soviet government stands at the corner of ulitsa Ilinka and Bolshoy Cherkasskiy pereulok. Uncompromisingly plain, with glazed tiles and rows of narrowly spaced windows, it was designed by Vladimir Mayat in the 1920s.

Founded by Prince Daniil, father of Grand Prince Ivan I (see p18) in 1296, the Monastery of the Epiphany is Moscow's second oldest monastery, after the Danilovskiy Monastery (see pp136–7). It was built at what was at that time the edge of the city, beyond the merchants' quarters.

The oldest building to survive is the cathedral. This is an addition to the original medieval complex and dates from 1693–6. The building is distinguished by its massive but refined tower, a masterpiece of Moscow Baroque (see p44). Among the other surviving features are a bishop's palace, a few 18th-century monastic cells and some trading rows.

Map 3 A5. M Lubyanka, Ploshchad Revolyutsii.

By the end of the 12th century, this street, which is named after the Kremlin's Nicholas' Tower (see p66), had been settled by merchants and traders. Trading stalls and shops remained a feature of the street until the Revolution. Following a dowdy period under communism, Nikolskaya ulitsa has recently moved up-market with the arrival of several expensive clothing stores and jewellers.

Through the courtyard at No. 7 is a gateway leading into the Zaikonospasskiy Monastery, which was founded in the 15th century or earlier. The name means Saviour Beyond the Icons and recalls the time when there was a brisk trade in icons here. The monastery church, with its dilapidated red brick tower and spire, dates from the 17th century. It is now open again for worship. From 1687–1814 the monastery also housed Moscow's first institute of higher education, referred to laboriously as the Slavic Greek Latin Academy. Among its pupils was the famous polymath and future founder of Moscow University, Mikhail Lomonosov (see p94).

At No. 15 are the fanciful Gothic-style spires of the Synodal Printing House. The pale blue building, with a lion and unicorn sculpted over its central window, contrasting with an incongruous hammer and sickle above, dates from 1810–14. The courtyard is enhanced by a colourful chequered roof and walls of blue and white tiles. In the chambers previously on this site Ivan Fyodorov produced Russia's first printed book, The Acts of the Apostles, in 1564.

Next door, in the courtyard of No. 17, is the Slavyanskiy Bazaar restaurant, which opened in 1870. Among its former patrons is Anton Chekhov (see p96). This restaurant is also where the theatre directors Konstantin Stanislavskiy and Vladimir Nemirovich-Danchenko began a meeting which concluded with the founding of the Moscow Arts Theatre (see p92). Following a fire in 1994, the restaurant was closed for repair, but there are plans to reopen it when this has been completed.

On the opposite side of the road is a building that used to house the Chizhevskoe Inn, a combined inn and warehouse for traders passing through Kitay Gorod. In the courtyard behind it is the 17th-century Church of the Assumption.

This diminutive cathedral is a replica of an original demolished in 1936. Its predecessor was consecrated in 1637 and housed the Icon of the Kazan Virgin. The icon was revered because it had accompanied Prince Dmitriy Pozharskiy during his victorious campaign against the invading Poles 25 years earlier (see p108).

Detailed plans and photographs, preserved by architect Pyotr Baranovskiy, assisted reconstruction of the cathedral in 1990–93 (see p44). It was reconsecrated by Patriarch Aleksey II in the presence of President Boris Yeltsin and the mayor of Moscow, Yuriy Luzhkov. The Icon of the Kazan Virgin in the cathedral is a copy, the original having been stolen in 1904.

Within the gateway is the equally colourful Chapel of the Iverian Virgin, originally built in the late 18th century to house an icon. Whenever the tsar came to Moscow, he would visit this shrine before entering the Kremlin (see pp52–67). Visitors should try to see the gate at night, when it is impressively lit up.

Towards the end of the 15th century, Ivan III (see p18) gave orders for houses in front of the Kremlin to be cleared to make way for this square. It originally served as a market called the torg, but the wooden stalls burned down so often that the area later became popularly known as Fire Square. The current name dates from the 17th century and is derived from the Russian word krasnyy, which originally meant “beautiful” but later came to denote “red”. The association between the colour red and Communism is purely coincidental.

Red Square, which is approximately 500m (1,600ft) in length, was also the setting for public announcements and executions. At its southern end, in front of St Basil’s Cathedral (see pp108–9), there is a small circular dais. Called Lobnoe Mesto, this is the platform from which the tsars and patriarchs would address the people. In 1606 the first “False Dmitry” (see p19), a usurper of the throne, was killed by a hostile crowd. His body was finally left at Lobnoe Mesto.

Six years later, a second pretender to the throne, who like the first “False Dmitry” was backed by Poland, took power. He was expelled from the Kremlin by an army led by the Russian heroes Dmitriy Pozharskiy and Kuzma Minin, who proclaimed Russia’s deliverance from Lobnoe Mesto. In 1818, a statue was erected in their honour (see p108). This now stands in front of St Basil’s.

Red Square has also long been a stage for pageants and processions. Before the Revolution (see pp26–9), the patriarch would ride an ass through Saviour’s Gate (see p66) to St Basil’s each Palm Sunday to commemorate Christ’s entry into Jerusalem.

Religious processions were abolished in the Communist era. Military parades took their place and were staged each year on May Day and on the anniversary of the Revolution. Rows of grim-faced Soviet leaders observed them from outside the Lenin Mausoleum. They, in turn, would be keenly studied by professional Kremlinologists in the West trying to work out the current pecking order.

Today the square is used for a variety of cultural events, concerts, firework displays and other public occasions.

The red-brick building facing St Basil’s Cathedral was constructed by Vladimir Sherwood in 1883 in the Russian-Revival style (see p45). It houses the Historical Museum. The museum boasts over four million exhibits covering the rise and expansion of the Russian state.

In front of the museum’s façade on Manezhnaya ploshchad is a statue by Vyacheslav Klykov of one of the heroes of World War II (see p27), Marshal Georgiy Zhukov. This statue of him was unveiled in 1995 to mark the 50th anniversary of the end of World War II.

Following Lenin's death in 1924, and against his wishes, it was decided to preserve the former Soviet leader's body for posterity. The body was embalmed and placed in a temporary wooden mausoleum in Red Square. Once it became clear that the embalming process had worked, Aleksey Shchusev (see p45) designed the current mausoleum of a pyramid of cubes cut from red granite and black labradorite.

Paying one's respects to Lenin's remains was once akin to a religious experience, and queues used to trail all over Red Square. In 1993, however, the goose-stepping guard of honour was replaced by a lone militiaman and now the mausoleum attracts mostly tourists. There are rumours that Lenin will soon be moved elsewhere or buried.

Behind the mausoleum at the foot of the Kremlin Wall are the graves of other famous communists. They include Lenin's successors, Joseph Stalin (at one time laid alongside Lenin in the Mausoleum), Leonid Brezhnev and Yuriy Andropov. Lenin's wife and sister are also buried here, as are the first man in space, Yuriy Gagarin, writer Maxim Gorky and American John Reed. The latter was honoured as the author of Ten Days that Shook the World, an account of the October Revolution.

Before the Revolution, this building was known as the Upper Trading Rows after the covered market that used to stand on the site. In fact, lines of stalls used to run all the way from here to the Moskva river. GUM has three separate arcades which are still called "lines". The store's name, Gosudarstvennyy universalnyy magazin, dates from its nationalization in 1921.

The building was designed by Aleksandr Pomerantsev in 1889–93 in the then fashionable Russian-Revival style. Its archways, wrought-iron railings and stuccoed galleries inside are especially impressive when sunlight streams through the glass roof.

There were once more than 1,000 shops here, selling goods ranging from furs and silks to humble candles. For a period, however, during the rule of Stalin (see p27), GUM's shops were requisitioned as offices. Nowadays, Western firms like Benetton, Estée Lauder and Christian Dior dominate the prestigious ground floor along with a variety of Western-style cafés and restaurants.

EMBALMING LENIN

"Do not raise monuments to him, or palaces to his name, do not organize pompous ceremonies in his memory." Such were the words of Lenin's widow, Krupskaya. Despite this, Lenin's body was embalmed by two professors and, after a delay to see if the process had worked, put on display. A laboratory is dedicated to preserving the body, which needs regular applications of special fluids. Rumours that parts or all of the body have been replaced with wax substitutes are vigorously denied.

St Basil's Cathedral 13

Detail, Chapel of the Entry of Christ into Jerusalem

Commissioned by Ivan the Terrible (see p18) to celebrate the capture of the Mongol stronghold of Kazan in 1552, St Basil's Cathedral was completed in 1561. It is reputed to have been designed by the architect Postnik Yakovlev. According to legend, Ivan was so amazed at the beauty of his work that he had him blinded so that he would never be able to design anything as exquisite again. The church was officially called the Cathedral of the Intercession because the final siege of Kazan began on the Feast of the Intercession of the Virgin. However, it is usually known as St Basil's after the "holy fool" Basil the Blessed whose remains are interred within. The cathedral's design, which was inspired by traditional Russian timber architecture, is a riot of gables, tent roofs and twisting onion domes.

★ Domes

Following a fire in 1583 the original helmet-shaped cupolas were replaced by ribbed or faceted onion domes. It is only since 1670 that the domes have been painted many colours; at one time St Basil's was white with golden domes.

Chapel of St Cyprian

This is one of eight main chapels commemorating the campaigns of Ivan the Terrible against the town of Kazan, to the east of Moscow. It is dedicated to St Cyprian, whose feast is on 2 October, the day after the last attack.

MININ AND POZHARSKIY

A bronze statue by Ivan Martos depicts two heroes from the Time of Troubles (see p19), the butcher Kuzma Minin and Prince Dmitriy Pozharskiy. They raised a volunteer force to fight the invading Poles and, in 1612, led their army to victory when they drove the Poles out of the Kremlin. The statue was erected in 1818, in the triumphal afterglow of the Napoleonic Wars.

Originally placed in the centre of Red Square facing the Kremlin, it was moved to its present site in front of St Basil's during the Soviet era.

Monument to Minin and Prince Pozharskiy

The Chapel of St Basil, the ninth chapel to be added to the cathedral, was built in 1588 to house the remains of the "holy fool", Basil the Blessed.

Ivanovskaya Hill 14

Ивановская горка

Map 3 C5. M Kitay Gorod.

This hilly area takes its name from the Ivanovskiy Convent on the corner of ulitsa Zabelina and Malyy Ivanovskiy pereulok. The convent's rather neglected remains can be seen behind a twin-towered gateway and high encircling walls.

Yelena Glinska, mother of Ivan the Terrible (see p18), founded the convent in 1533 as a gesture of thanks for the birth of her son. Later, however, it doubled as a prison for many years – its most famous inmate was Avgusta Tarakanova, the illegitimate daughter of Tsarina Elizabeth (see p22) and Count Aleksey Razumovskiy. She was educated abroad before being brought to Russia in 1785 and put into the convent under an assumed name. She spent the rest of her life here as a solitary nun, forbidden to receive any visitors except for the mother superior. She died in 1810.

Across the road is the Church of St Vladimir in the Old Gardens. It was built in 1514 by Italian architect Aleviz Novyy, but it was extensively altered at the end of the 17th century. Its name refers to the tsar's orchards, which used to occupy the slopes of the hill.

One of the pleasures of this area is exploring its unusually quiet backstreets. At the end of Malyy Ivanovskiy pereulok, which runs down from the Ivanovskiy Convent, is Podkolokolnyy pereulok (Lane Beneath the Bells). This street is dominated by the Church of St Nicholas the Wonderworker, which dates from the mid-17th century and is recognizable by its outsized red bell tower. Perhaps the most impressive church in the area is SS Peter and Paul on Petropavlovskiy pereulok. It was built in 1700 and contains an icon of the Bogolyubovskaya Virgin, which used to hang in a chapel near the gate to the city at the end of ulitsa Varvarka (see p102).

To the north, at No. 10 Kolpachiy pereulok is the 17th-century mansion that reputedly belonged to the Ukrainian chief Ivan Mazepa. He fled to Turkish-controlled Moldova in 1709, after betraying Peter the Great (see p22) to the Swedes and then being defeated by him. Tchaikovsky set the story to music in his opera, Mazepa. The name of another street, Kokhlovskiy pereulok, may also have a Ukrainian link; Ukrainians used to be known as kbokhbly because of the tufts of hair they grew at the back of their shaved heads; (kbokhbly means tufted in Russian).

The most notable building standing on ulitsa Maroseyka is the blue and white mansion at No. 17. This is now the Belarusian embassy.

Designed by architect Ippolit Monighetti, the central section of this museum was built in 1877 and is a superb example of Russian-Revival architecture (see p45), which was very popular in the late 19th century. The north and south wings were added in 1896 and 1907 respectively.

The items on display were originally assembled for an exhibition staged in the Alexander Gardens (see p67) in 1872. This marked the 200th anniversary of the birth of Peter the Great, himself an enthusiastic amateur scientist.

The museum is a popular outing for schoolchildren. Its original collection has been expanded to trace the development of Russian science and technology during the 19th and 20th centuries. Exhibits range from early clocks and cameras to cars and space capsules. Every two hours there are demonstrations of devices such as robots, working models and sound equipment.

This museum was founded in 1896 and is housed in the 19th-century church of St John the Divine Under the Elm. There has been some speculation about finding larger premises, but this has yet to be decided upon.

Only a fraction of the one million items in the collection can be displayed at any time. These include Iron and Bronze Age artifacts, colossal timbers from a medieval log cabin, unearthed during the building of the State Kremlin Palace (see p56) in the Kremlin, and a growing treasure-trove of jewellery, toys and pottery. There are also priceless early maps, rare illuminated books, paintings, glass, ceramics and scale models of the Kremlin.

Vladimir Mayakovsky, poet, iconoclast, exhibitionist and consummate self-publicist, was above all a revolutionary. In his short but eventful life his poetry, plays, film scripts and poster art gave a strident voice to the Revolution and its vision of modernity. The terse and uncompromising agitprop posters he designed with Aleksandr Rodchenko are a prominent feature of the museum.

By nature, Mayakovsky was both provocative and extraordinary, and this is brilliantly reflected in this apparently anarchic museum. Huge frameworks of metal bars, designed in the Constructivist style influential in the 1920s, lean at fantastic angles and provide a backdrop for the other exhibits. Mayakovsky's artworks and belongings are intermingled: chairs, old boots, typewriters, painted cannon balls, large posters and photomontages, cracked mirrors, sewing machines and manuscripts.

Room designed to symbolize Mayakovsky's poetic origins

Mayakovsky actually lived in this block from 1919 until his death in 1930: a single room on the fourth floor has been furnished to look as it would have done when he moved in. While living in this house, Mayakovsky continued his long-running love affair with Lilya Brik, the wife of his friend Osip Brik. This was also the period in which he wrote his best known plays, the caustic satires The Bed Bug and Bath House.

The last part of the exhibition deals with Mayakovsky's suicide at the age of 37. On display are two death masks, one black and one white. After his death, Stalin (see p27) praised Mayakovsky as the most talented of Soviet poets and continued to use his work for propaganda purposes.

VLADIMIR MAYAKOVSKY

Born in Georgia in 1893, Mayakovsky was brought up in Moscow, where he became involved in the revolutionary movement at the tender age of 14. Earning his revolutionary honours by being arrested three times in the space of two years, he was also drawn to the avant-garde and in 1912 became a founder of the Futurist movement by contributing to its manifesto, A Slap in the Face for Public Taste. Mayakovsky wholeheartedly endorsed the Revolution (see p26–9), becoming one of its most effective propagandists, but became increasingly disillusioned with the straitjacketed attitudes of Soviet society in the 1920s; this may have contributed to his suicide in 1930.

Lubyanka Square 18

Лубянская площадь
Lubyanskaya ploshchad

Map 3 B5. M Lubyanka.

Synonymous with terror and the secret police, the name Lubyanka struck fear into the hearts of generations of Soviet citizens. In 1918, the Cheka (the forerunners of the KGB), led by the hated "Iron" Feliks Dzerzhinskiy, took over what had been the Rossiya Insurance Offices at the northern end of the square.

In the 1930s the building was extended and the enormous, underground Lubyanka Prison added, where the KGB interrogated, tortured, imprisoned and killed hundreds of thousands of people. By 1947 the incredible numbers of those accused in the course of Stalin's rule (see p27) led to the building of an additional wing, designed by Aleksey Shchusev (see p45). Despite numerous changes of name (and protestations of changes in ethos), the Russian intelligence services still occupy the building.

A statue of Dzerzhinskiy used to stand in the centre of Lubyanka square. It was unceremoniously toppled in front of a cheering crowd, following the unsuccessful coup against President Gorbachev in 1991 (see p31). The statue can now be seen in the Graveyard of Fallen Monuments (see p135).

With their customary lack of irony, the Soviet authorities built Russia's largest toy store, Detskiy Mir (Children's World) (see p185), directly opposite the KGB headquarters in 1957.

This road is part of the historic Boulevard Ring, which was laid out along the line of the old Belyy Gorod (White City) wall after the great fire of 1812 (see p24).

There are several fine houses located along Chistoprudnyy bulvar. At No. 19a is the elegant, Classical-style portico of the Sovremennik Theatre, which was built as a cinema by Roman Klein in 1914. Just beyond is the mansion where Sergey Eisenstein, director of October and Battleship Potemkin, lived from 1920–34.

Feliks Dzerzhinskiy

Chistoprudnyy bulvar is part of the area which used to be known as Myasnitskaya after the butchers (myasniki) who worked here in the 17th century. The myasniki are still commemorated in the name of Myasnitskaya ulitsa, which runs from Lubyanka Square to Chistoprudnyy bulvar.

Between the carriageways of Chistoprudnyy bulvar is a large pond. It was created as a place for the butchers to dump offal and other waste products but, by 1703, the stench and risk of disease were so bad that the pond was cleared and renamed Chistye prudy (Clean Pond).

The beautiful, pale blue mansion just round the corner, at No. 22 ulitsa Pokrovka, was built between 1766–72. Before the communist coup in October 1917, the building used to be one of the best male secondary schools in Moscow, dating from 1861.

This church was constructed on the orders of Prince Aleksandr Menshikov, Peter the Great's advisor and favourite. With Peter the Great's backing, Menshikov rose from the position of lowly pie-seller to be one of most powerful and wealthy men in Russia. It was typical of the flamboyant Menshikov that, when he commissioned the church from Ivan Zarudniy in 1701, he instructed the architect to make it just a little taller than the Ivan the Great Bell Tower (see p57), until then the tallest structure in all of Russia.

Specialist stonemasons from Yaroslavl and Kostroma and a variety of Italian sculptors worked on the church, accounting for the beauty of the stone carvings and stuccoed festoons. The wooden spire was capped by a gilded angel and contained an expensive English clock, which chimed on the quarter-hour.

The infamous former headquarters of the KGB on Lubyanka Square

However, pious Muscovites remained unimpressed by the display of wealth and when the tower was destroyed by lightning in 1723 many saw in it the hand of God. The tower was rebuilt without the spire in 1773–80. The church was one of the few to remain open during the Soviet era and much of its interior decoration has survived.

Next to the tower is the small Church of St Fyodor Stratilit, which was heated in winter for the benefit of the parishioners. It was built in 1806, probably by Ivan Yegotov.

The original Sandunovskiy Baths were built for actor Sila Sandunov in 1808. In 1895 they were replaced by this building designed by Boris Freidenberg and with a decorative Beaux Arts façade.

The main entrance is through an ornate archway, decorated with sculptures of nymphs on horseback, emerging from the sea and using triton shells as trumpets.

However, it is the sumptuous interiors, decorated in a flamboyant mix of Baroque, Gothic and Moorish styles, that make the baths famous. The Alhambra Palace in Spain was one of the sources of inspiration for the ornate decoration. The baths can accommodate up to 2,000 customers a day. The best, most expensive, rooms are located on the first floor. Here patrons can still buy birch twigs to beat themselves with, an essential part of a Russian steam bath.

ZAMOSKVORECHE

First settled in the 13th century, Zamoskvoreche (literally “beyond the Moscow river”) acted as an outpost against the Mongols. Its main road, Bolshaya Ordynka, was the route to the Orda, or Golden Horde, the Mongol headquarters on the Volga river. Later, under Ivan the Terrible, the Streltsy (royal guard) was stationed here. Artisans serving the court also moved in, living in areas according to their trades, each of which sponsored a church. These historic churches, now in varying states of repair, and the fact that the area was almost untouched by the replanning of the 1930s, give it a more old-fashioned atmosphere than the centre, which is dominated by massive Soviet architecture. In the 19th century wealthy merchants settled here, many of whom, such as Aleksey Bakhrushin and Pavel Tretyakov, were patrons of the arts. Based on its founder’s acquisitions, the Tretyakov Gallery is the nation’s most important collection of Russian art.

GETTING THERE

If using the metro, it is best to head for Tretyakovskaya, Novokuznetskaya or Paveletskaya metro stations. Trolleybuses, buses and trams all cross the Moskva River at various points to reach Zamoskvoreche. Trolleybus routes include the 1, 4, 8, 33 and 62, while buses 6, 25 and K and trams 3, 39 and A also serve the area.

Street-by-Street: Around Pyatnitskaya Ulitsa

An old-fashioned atmosphere still prevails in the area around Pyatnitskaya ulitsa. The well-established streets are lined with attractive 19th-century churches and imposing Neo-Classical mansions. The busiest part of the district is the area around Tretyakovskaya metro. The market stalls on the station forecourt spill over onto Klimentovskiy pereulok, and nearby Pyatnitskaya ulitsa is the main shopping street. A short walk to the west is the stunning Tretyakov Gallery. To the north, the area is bordered by the Vodootvodnyy canal, which was built in 1783–6 to prevent the regular spring flooding of the Moskva river.

Tretyakovskaya galereya

The Tretyakov Gallery was founded in 1856 by the wealthy merchant Pavel Tretyakov. He presented his private museum of Russian art to the city in 1892. His brother Sergey also donated a number of works and the gallery's collection has been expanding ever since. Today the Tretyakov has the largest collection of Russian art in the world. The building has a striking façade, designed by artist Viktor Vasnetsov, with a bas-relief of St George and the dragon at its centre. A new wing was added to the gallery in 1930. Many of the early 20th-century works from the collection have now been housed in the New Tretyakov Gallery (see p135).

GALLERY GUIDE

The gallery has 62 rooms on two main floors. On entering the museum, visitors first descend to the basement ticket office, then head straight up to the first floor. Paintings are hung in chronological order in rooms 1–54: visitors take some stairs back down to the ground floor after viewing room 34. Russian jewellery is housed on the ground floor in room 55, while rooms 56–62 contain icons and jewellery.

Exploring the Tretyakov Gallery

Although the gallery's collection began with the paintings donated by Pavel Tretyakov, it continued to expand after the Revolution as numerous private collections were nationalized by the Soviet regime. There are currently more than 100,000 Russian works in the collection. Paintings from after the Revolution – mainly Socialist-Realist works – are now exhibited in the New Tretyakov Gallery (see p135), while the main gallery displays Russian art ranging from the icons of the medieval period to early 20th-century paintings.

Portrait of Ursula Mnichek
by Dmitriy Levitskiy

18TH AND EARLY 19TH CENTURIES

Painting in Russia was exclusively religious in character for over 600 years. However, a profound transformation occurred in the 18th century as secular art from Europe began to influence Russian artists. Portrait painting came into its own with technically accomplished canvases by artists such as Vladimir Borovikovskiy (1757–1825), Fyodor Rokotov (c.1736–1808) and Dmitriy Levitskiy (c.1735–1822), whose charming Portrait of Ursula Mnichek is among those in the gallery. The Romantic movement is represented in the collection by such pictures as Vasily Tropinin's refined but sentimental portrait of his son and Orest Kiprenskiy's famous Portrait of the Poet Alexander Pushkin (1827). Several of Aleksandr Ivanov's (1806–58) historical canvases are also displayed here, including his outstanding painting, The Appearance of Christ to the People. Begun in 1837, it took 20 years to finish.

SECOND HALF OF THE 19TH CENTURY

The art of this period was dominated by Realism. In 1870 a group of artists founded the Association of Travelling Art Exhibitions. Its members, who became known as the Wanderers (peredvizhniki), began to produce "socially useful art" highlighting injustices and inequalities. One of the leaders of the movement was Vasily Perov (1834–82) whose satirical Tea-drinking in Mytishchi exposes hypocrisy among the clergy. Another Wanderer was Vasily Surikov, whose picture of The Morning of the Execution of the Streltsy (1881) instills new realism into a dramatic episode of Russian history. Ivan Kramskoy, the head of the group, aimed to portray the moral character of his subjects in paintings such as Portrait of Pavel Tretyakov.

Landscapes were popular subjects for the Wanderers and the gallery's many examples

PAVEL TRETYAKOV

Pavel Tretyakov began collecting Russian art in 1856 and was particularly interested in works by the Wanderers (peredvizhniki). His collection grew and in 1892 he donated it to the city of Moscow. His home was opened as a gallery and, much extended, still houses the collection today. Pavel Tretyakov was director of the gallery for the last six years of his life.

include Vasily Polenov's A Moscow Courtyard (1878) and The Rooks Have Come (1871) by Aleksey Savrasov.

A number of works by Ilya Repin (1844–1930), the most versatile of the Wanderers, are on display. They include the enormous canvases Religious Procession in Kursk Province; They Did Not Expect Him and Ivan the Terrible and his Son Ivan on 16 November, 1581, and striking portraits of Repin's friends and contemporaries.

Ivan the Terrible and his Son Ivan on 16 November, 1581 (1885), by Ilya Repin

Vasily Vereschagin (1842–1904), whose paintings are on display in room 27, is another great amongst the Wanderers. He travelled widely in Asia and volunteered for the Russian army, garnering impressions he would later use in his massive, highly detailed paintings. One of Vereschagin's most famous works is Apotheosis of War (1871), depicting a pyramid of skulls and ironically dedicated to “all the great conquerors of the past, present and future”. He was revolutionary in his approach to exhibitions, being the first artist in Russia to present his work in specially prepared environments, with darkened halls and black walls enhancing the mood of his paintings.

LATE 19TH AND EARLY 20TH CENTURIES

During the 1890s, the social ideals that inspired the Wanderers no longer appealed to a new generation of artists. Instead they rallied behind a call for “art for art’s sake”.

The innovative artist Mikhail Vrubel (1856–1910) was influenced by the poetry of the Russian Symbolists. Many of his dark, brooding works, such as Demon Seated, also reflect his troubled mental state.

French painting had a huge impact on this and subsequent generations of artists. This influence can be seen in the Impressionist work Paris, Boulevard des Capucines, painted in 1911 by Konstantin Korovin. The style of Valentin Serov's (1865–1911) early paintings was also close to Impressionism. His Girl with Peaches (see p47) is a charming portrait of the daughter of art patron Savva Mamontov.

In the decade leading up to World War I, Moscow was the centre of Russia's avant-garde movement, receptive to developments from abroad, such as Cubism and Futurism, as well as taking ideas from indigenous folk art, which inspired Primitivism. Primitivist works feature bold shapes and bright colours. Staro Basmannaya – Board No. 1 by Vladimir Tatlin (1885–1953) and Bathing Horses by Natalya Goncharova (1881–1962) are among the gallery's works in this style.

DRAWINGS AND WATERCOLOURS

The gallery owns a substantial collection of sketches, lithographs and watercolours by artists from the 18th–20th centuries but, to avoid exhibits being damaged by exposure to light, only a small proportion are on show at any time.

Among the watercolours are a delightful equestrian portrait by Karl Bryullov (1799–1852) and some preparatory biblical sketches by Aleksandr Ivanov. Landscapes by Isaak Levitan (1861–1900) and Konstantin Korovin contrast with delicate pencil portraits by artists as diverse as Ilya Repin, Valentin Serov and Natalya Goncharova.

ICONS AND JEWELLERY

A fine collection of religious icons dating from the 12th–17th centuries is housed in the Tretyakov. Russian icon painting inherited the dark colours and immobile, otherworldly images of the saints from Byzantine art. One of the most revered icons, the 12th-century Virgin of Vladimir (see p61), originated in Byzantium, but was brought to Moscow via Kiev and Vladimir.

However, Russian icon painters lightened their palettes, introducing shades such as yellow ochre, vermilion and white. A typical example is The Transfiguration (c.1403), painted by a follower of Theophanes the Greek (see p61). It shows Christ standing over cowering sinners.

Andrey Rublev's stunning icon The Trinity dates from around 1420.

Alongside it are icons by other masters of the Moscow school (see p61), including Dionysius (c.1440–c.1508).

Also on the ground floor is a room devoted to Russian jewellery from the 13th–20th centuries.

This five-domed church is among the most striking examples of Moscow Baroque (see p44) and is thought to have been designed by Sergey Turchaninov, favourite architect of Patriarch Nikon (see pp56–7). The small group of buildings around it also includes a refectory and tiered bell tower. It was paid for by a wealthy guild of weavers who had moved into the street by the 17th century. Before that an earlier church stood here, in what was at that time the district of Kadeshevo, hence the name that survives today.

The church was built around 1687, and the slender, tapering bell tower added in the 1690s.

Apart from the five green onion domes, visible from all over the neighbourhood, the most notable features are the tiers of lace-like limestone balustrades just below the drums supporting the domes. The church is now an art restoration workshop.

Both the church of the Consolation of All Sorrows and the Neo-Classical yellow mansion opposite belonged to the Dolgovs, a wealthy merchant family. After completion of their house in the 1770s, they commissioned the church from Vasily Bazhenov (see p44), a relation by marriage. He first built a new belfry and refectory, which are among the few surviving buildings in Moscow by this talented architect, and then replaced the existing medieval church in 1783–91. It was finished by the Kumanins, another merchant family.

That church, however, was destroyed in the great fire of 1812 (see p24). Another new one was designed by Osip Bove (see p45), who was the architect in charge of Moscow's reconstruction after the fire.

His Empire-style rotunda and dome, which still survive today, were finished in 1833.

The interior is unusual in an Orthodox church due to its lavish Empire-style colonnade, theatrical iconostasis and exuberant sculpted angels. On display in the church's left aisle, originally dedicated to the Transfiguration, is the Icon of Our Lady of Consolation of All Sorrows. It is said to have miraculously cured the ailing sister of Patriarch Joachim in the 17th century.

This imposing, red-painted 18th-century church is now in a sadly decayed state. In 1756–8 the present refectory and belfry were built onto a church dating from the 1720s. This was pulled down in the 1760s when a new church was commissioned by the merchant Kuzma Matveev, a wealthy been unsafe to enter for some years and it is unlikely that it will reopen in the near future.

Small crowns, as well as the traditional crosses, decorate the silver domes of this splendid church. It was constructed between 1670–72 in the area of the city once inhabited by the Streltsy, the royal guard, who provided the funds for it. Some of these men were later executed by Peter the Great for their role in the 1682 Streltsy Rebellion (see p22). Funds were, in particular, generously lavished on the exterior decoration, which includes remarkable fretted cornices and finely chiselled window frames. The church's slender, tiered bell tower is one of the finest in the city, whilst the iconostasis contains some original icons as well as copies of more famous ones.

Originally a wooden church built by the cosmetic merchants' guild in the 16th century, Catherine the Great commissioned the architect Karl Blank to redesign and rebuild the church in the 1760s. It is dedicated to St Catherine of Alexandria who was beheaded in the 4th century on the orders of the Roman emperor Maximian for refusing to renounce her Christian faith.

The distinct architecture of the Church of St Catherine combines certain elements of Moscow baroque and rococo. Of interest are the ornate metal railings outside, which are superb and unique examples of 18th-century metalwork. Originally, they were located in the Kremlin between the Cathedral of the Archangel Michael and the Patriarchal Palace.

In 1931 the church was closed, its bell-tower dismantled and almost all the icons (painted by Levitsky and Vasilevsky) were removed. Since the early 1990s, however, it has been undergoing a programme of restoration to return it to its former glory.

A low archway leads from the street to this secluded compound, containing what appear at first glance to be medieval buildings. In fact they date from 1908–12 and were designed by Aleksey Shchusev (see p45).

The convent was conceived to house a dispensary, a clinic, a small women's hospital and a school. It was run by the Order of the Sisters of Charity which was founded by the Grand Duchess Yelizaveta Fyodorovna, sister-in-law of Tsar Nicholas II. She had turned to charitable work after her husband, Grand Prince Sergei (Tsar Nicholas II's uncle), was assassinated by a terrorist bomb in the troubled year of 1905 (see p26). Yelizaveta also met a violent death: the day after the shooting of Tsar Nicholas II and his family in 1918, the Bolsheviks pushed her down a mine shaft with further members of the royal family.

When designing the Church of the Intercession, the convent's main building, Shchusev carried out considerable research into Russian religious architecture, particularly that of the Pskov and Novgorod schools (see p44). Shchusev's ingenious design juxtaposed a highly traditional style with Style-Moderne features such as boldly pointed gables, limestone carvings of mythical creatures and Slavonic script on the outer walls.

The artist Mikhail Nesterov, a protégé of industrialist and art patron Savva Mamontov (see p160), was commissioned to design and paint the frescoes in the interior of the church. He also designed the pale grey and white habits of the nuns.

After the Revolution the Order of the Sisters of Charity was suppressed and the church was used as a workshop for restoring icons for a number of years. The nuns have now returned to staff the clinic.

A highly talented portrait artist, Vasily Tropinin executed a staggering 3,000 paintings in his life. As well as painting figures in high society, he is noted as one of the first Russian artists to depict working people. Works spanning his career are displayed in this attractive museum set in a blue and white Neo-Classical house. The furnishings and ornaments are from Tropinin's time and are mostly in Empire style.

The museum's collection is based on works gathered by Feliks Vishnevskiy (1902–78). Having been a supporter of the Revolution, he was able to collect during the Soviet period when paintings were relatively cheap. In addition to Tropinin's oil portraits, there are works by

Though born a serf in Karpovo near Novgorod, Vasily Tropinin's prodigious talent was recognized at an early age. He was sent to the St Petersburg Academy of Arts in 1798, but was withdrawn by his master and brought back to work as an interior decorator, pastry-cook and footman on his estates. Tropinin and his wife gained their freedom in 1823 and moved to Moscow, where Tropinin became a professional portrait artist. Founded in 1894 by Aleksey Bakhrushin, a merchant and patron of the arts, this museum contains probably the most important collection of theatre memorabilia in Russia. Spread over two floors, the exhibits range from sets and costumes to theatre tickets, programmes, advertisements and signed photographs.

The basement is filled with items relating to the career of the great opera singer Fyodor Shalyapin (see p83). One of the highlights is a richly brocaded costume he wore for the title role in Modest Mussorgsky's opera Boris Godunov.

A display on early Russian theatre includes puppets, models of theatres and sets, and paintings and engravings of theatrical entertainments.

Exhibits on 19th-century theatre include costumes and sets from the Ballets Russes. This famous company, formed by Sergey Diaghilev in 1909, revolutionized ballet. The sets include some designed by Michel Fokine, the company's inspired choreographer.

Situated opposite the Kremlin, on the southern bank of the Moskva river, the Sophia Embankment stretches from the Bolshoy Kamennyi most (Great Stone bridge) to the Bolshoy Moskvoretskiy most (Great Moscow river bridge).

The embankment was built up to its current height at the end of the 18th century and was greatly improved in 1836. It offers spectacular views over the Kremlin and the city.

Novgorodians settled on the river bank in the 14th century and built the original Church of St Sophia. The present church dates from the mid-17th century. Aleksandr Kaminskiy added the bell tower in 1862.

The mansion at No. 14 was designed by Vasilii Zaleskiy in 1893 for a sugar baron and is now the British ambassador's residence. The interiors are by Fyodor Shekhtel (see p45).

FURTHER AFIELD

Moscow's suburbs are generally rather bleak, but they conceal a surprising number of attractions, all accessible by metro. To the south of the centre lies a number of fortified monasteries, built to defend the city against the Mongols and the Poles. The most spectacular of them is Novodevichiy Convent, a serene 16th-century sanctuary with a glorious cathedral, but the Donskoy Monastery is also well worth a visit. The Danilovskiy Monastery, with its handsome cathedral, is the oldest in the city.

Cathedral fresco,

Visitors to Moscow are often surprised at the beauty and variety of its green spaces. Gorky, Izmaylovo and Victory parks are the perfect places in which to relax, while Sparrow Hills offers fantastic views. The city's best-kept secrets, however, are the grand estates away from the centre in what was formerly countryside. There the Sheremetev family built two elegant Neo-Classical summer residences: Kuskovo and Ostankino. Both have beautifully preserved gardens and palaces full of fine paintings and period furnishings.

This stunning church was commissioned by an uncle of Peter the Great, Prince Lev Naryshkin, and is in the style known as Moscow, or Naryshkin, Baroque (see p44). Built by an unknown architect, between 1690 and 1693 it is an extraordinary tiered structure of red brick, with lace-like ornamentation and pilasters of white stone.

Russian churches often comprise two buildings: a grand, unheated one for summer, and a smaller, simpler one that can be heated easily in winter.

Here, the winter church at ground level has changing displays of religious art. In front of it a double staircase rises to a terrace surrounding the upper summer church. This staircase would once have provided the setting for processions. Inside, there is an iconostasis, mainly the work of the 17th-century painter Karp Zolotarev, and a carved gilt pew used by Peter the Great.

A marble-clad building with a gilded clock tower, the White House is still a “must-see” for tourists interested in recent political history.

Once the seat of the Russian Federation's parliament, it first claimed the world's attention in August 1991 when it was the focus of resistance to the Communist hardliners' coup against Mikhail Gorbachev, the president of the Soviet Union. The rebels detained Gorbachev at his Black Sea villa, where he was holidaying at the time, so it was Boris Yeltsin, the president of the smaller Russian Federation, who led the opposition to the coup. The world watched as he passed through the lines of tanks surrounding the White House without anyone daring to arrest him. Then he climbed onto a tank to proclaim: “You can build a throne of bayonets, but you cannot sit on it for long”.

The coup failed, and the victory of Yeltsin and his supporters was soon followed by the break-up of the Soviet Union and the end of Communist rule.

However, in September 1993, a reversal of roles occurred at the White House when Yeltsin became the besieger. Hundreds of deputies locked themselves into it in protest when Yeltsin summarily suspended parliament over its increasing opposition to his new draft constitution. The siege ended after two weeks when army tanks bombarded the deputies into submission.

The charred building was quickly repaired, but never regained its former significance; today the Russian parliament occupies a building on ulitsa Okhotnyy ryad (see p86), and the presidential offices are in the Kremlin (see pp52–67).

Commemorating victory in the Great Patriotic War, the Russian name for World War II (see p27), Victory Park was originally intended to have a vast monument to Mother Russia at its centre. After the end of Communist rule, plans were scaled down and the park was finally completed in 1995, in time for the 50th anniversary of the end of the war.

The park is formally laid out, with straight alleys dividing the sparsely-treed grass. The main,

The Stalinist-Gothic skyscraper of the Moscow State University

fountain-lined avenue leads from Kutuzovskiy prospekt to the central Nike Monument, a towering, 142-m (466-ft) obelisk designed by Zurb Tsereteli to honour the Greek goddess of victory.

Behind the monument is the domed, semi-circular Museum of the Great Patriotic War. The dioramas, models, maps and weapons on show give an informative picture of the war as experienced by the Russians.

Just to the side of the central avenue is the simple Church of St George the Victorious, built in 1995, probably the first to be built in Russia after the Revolution. Next to it is a monument to war victims.

East along Kutuzovskiy prospekt are two large-scale memorials to the war of 1812 (see pp23–5). Moscow's final deliverance from the French is celebrated by the grand Triumphal Arch. It was designed by Osip Bove (see p45), with sculptures of Russian and Classical warriors by Ivan Vitali and Ivan Timofeev. Originally built on Tverskaya ulitsa in 1834, the arch was dismantled in the 1930s during street-widening. The sculptures were preserved and in 1968 the arch was rebuilt at its present site.

Further along the street, at No. 38, is the circular Borodino Panorama Museum, which contains a vast painting, 115-m (377-ft) long and 14-m (46-ft) high. It was created by Franz Roubaud in 1912 to mark the centenary of the battle between Russian forces and Napoleon's army at Borodino (see p158).

The summit of this wooded ridge offers unsurpassed views across the city. There is an observation point on ulitsa Kosygina and newly-wed couples traditionally come here to have their photograph taken against the panorama. It is also a favourite pitch for a large number of souvenir sellers.

The hills are dominated by the Moscow State University (MGU) building commissioned by Stalin, designed by Lev Rudnev and completed in 1953. At 36 floors high it is the tallest of the seven Stalinist-Gothic “wedding-cakes” (see p45).

The small, green-domed Church of the Trinity (1811) can also be seen close by, to the left of the observation platform. There are also a couple of long, but somewhat rickety, ski jumps on the hills.

On prospekt Vernadskovo, on the southeast edge of the hills, is the Palace of Youth and Creative Work, a studio complex built for the Communist youth organization. Also on this street are the silver-roofed New Moscow Circus (see p198) built in 1971, and the Nataliya Sats Children's Musical Theatre (see p199).

Moscow's most famous park is named in honour of the writer Maxim Gorky and extends for more than 120 ha (297 acres) along the banks of the Moskva river. Opened in 1928 as the Park of Culture and Rest, it incorporates the Golitsyn Gardens, laid out by Matvey Kazakov (see p44) in the late 18th century, and a 19th-century pleasure park. During the Soviet era, loudspeakers were used to deliver speeches by Communist leaders across the park. Today the highlights include fairground rides, woodland walks, boating lakes, a 10,000-seat outdoor theatre and, in the winter months, an ice rink.

The park was immortalized in the opening scenes of Michael Apted's film Gorky Park. However, because of the tense political climate of 1983, the film was actually shot in Finland.

Probably the most beautiful of the semi-circle of fortified religious institutions to the south of Moscow is Novodevichiy Convent, founded by Basil III in 1524 to commemorate the capture of Smolensk from the Lithuanians. Only the Cathedral of the Virgin of Smolensk was built at this time. Most of the other buildings were added in the late 17th century by Peter the Great's half-sister, the Regent Sophia. After Peter deposed her and reclaimed his throne in 1689 (see p22), he confined her here for the rest of her life. In 1812 Napoleon's troops tried to blow up the convent but, according to a popular story, it was saved by the nuns, who snuffed out the fuses.

The Church of the Assumption and adjoining refectory were built in the 1680s on the orders of the Regent Sophia.

The presence of one of Russia's greatest novelists can be felt in every corner of this evocative, wooden house. It was here that Leo Tolstoy (1828–1910) spent the winters between 1882 and 1901 with his long-suffering wife, Sofya Andreevna, and the nine surviving of their 13 children. The summers were spent on the Tolstoy ancestral estate at Yasnaya Polyana (see p167), 200 km (124 miles) away.

The Moscow house was turned into a museum in 1921 on Lenin's orders and has been preserved much as it would have been when Tolstoy and his family resided here.

On the ground floor, the large table in the dining room is still laid with crockery. The evening meal in the Tolstoy household always began promptly at 6pm to the summons of the cuckoo clock on the wall. Next door is the "corner room" where, at one time, the elder sons, Sergey, Ilya and Lev, would retire to play Chinese billiards.

The simple desk in Tolstoy's study where he wrote his final novel, Resurrection

LEO TOLSTOY

By the time Tolstoy was in his 50s, he was an author of international renown and had written his two great masterpieces War and Peace (1865–9) and Anna Karenina (1873–7). He continued to write fiction, but later renounced his earlier books and the world they depicted. Instead Tolstoy concentrated on his highly individual brand of Christian Humanism, a doctrine that included non-violence, vegetarianism and total sexual abstinence. It was in this period that he wrote the stories The Death of Ivan Ilych and the Kreutzer Sonata and his last great novel, Resurrection, which strayed so far from Orthodoxy that the Holy Synod excommunicated him in 1901. Tolstoy left Moscow the same year for Yasnaya Polyana, where he devoted himself totally to mysticism and the education of the peasants on the estate.

The dining room with a painting of Tolstoy's favourite daughter Mariya

The house exudes a sense of ordered, comfortable family life, but Tolstoy and his wife frequently quarrelled violently, largely on account of his wish to renounce society and live as simply as possible. The couple were reconciled for a short time when Vanya, their much-loved youngest child died from scarlet fever at the age of seven. His memory is preserved in his small bedroom near the scullery, where his high chair, rocking horse and books can be seen.

The bedroom of Tolstoy's second daughter, Tatyana, is crammed with ornaments and keepsakes. She was a talented artist and her own paintings and sketches are hung on the walls.

The stairs to the first floor open into the salon, a large hall where frequent guests were treated to supper. They included the young Sergei Rachmaninoff who accompanied the bass, Fyodor Shalyapin (see p83), on the piano here, the artist Ilya Repin, whose portrait of Tatyana now hangs in the "corner room", the music critic Vladimir Stasov, and the writer Maxim Gorky (see p95) with whom Tolstoy would play chess. The drawing room next door was decorated by Sofya Andreevna herself.

The bedroom of Tolstoy's favourite child, Mariya, is rather spartan, testifying to her sympathy for her father's ideals and way of life.

At the far end of the upstairs passage is Tolstoy's study, a spacious room overlooking the garden. Reflecting his passion for austerity, the room is simply furnished in black leather. The plain, solid desk where he wrote his novel Resurrection is lit by candles. Rather than admit to being shortsighted, Tolstoy sawed off the ends of his chair legs to bring himself closer to his papers. In the adjoining washroom are dumbbells and a bicycle – evidence of his interest in keeping fit. Also on show are the tools he used for his hobby of shoemaking, with some of the pairs he made. The back stairs close by lead to the garden, which is only accessible to those taking a guided tour.

This huge white box of a building is an annexe of the Tretyakov Gallery (see pp118–21) in the centre of town. It is devoted to Russian art from the early 1900's to the present. Most of the canvases here belong to the official movement known as Socialist Realism and reflect the cultural straitjacket imposed by Stalin (see p27) in the 1930s. It had its roots in the Wanderers movement of the 1860s, which was based on the principle that art has, first and foremost, a social role to play, though lyricism and beauty in paintings were also important (see p120). In contrast, the hard-hitting art of the Communist era served the state's interests, reflecting socialist goals and achievements. A few examples of the titles given to the paintings say it all: Life is Getting Better; Building New Factories; Unforgettable Meeting (between Stalin and a spellbound young woman). Technological achievements were also immortalized in pictures such as The First Russian Airship.

Many people will find the Modernist paintings at the beginning of the exhibition more aesthetically pleasing. These include pictures by previously outlawed artists, such as the Black Square by Kazimir Malevich and works by Constructivists such as Aleksandr Rodchenko and the brothers Georgiy and Vladimir Stenberg.

Outside, on the Moskva river embankment, is the Graveyard of Fallen Monuments, a collection of some of the sculptures removed from around Moscow at the end of the Soviet era. Pride of place belongs to the huge statue of the secret police chief, Feliks Dzerzhinskiy, which was taken down from outside the KGB headquarters in Lubyanka Square (see p112) in 1991. A striking addition to the view from the Tretyakov's gardens is a huge statue of Peter the Great by Zurab Tsereteli, completed in 1997.

The plans for this famous church, attributed to the architect Ivan Zarudniy, are said to have been personally approved by Peter the Great (see p22). Building work took place from 1709–13 and the result is a notable example of Petrine Baroque, a style which had begun to flourish in St Petersburg, the tsar's new capital. The church's most eye-catching feature is a tiered octagonal tower, with an elegant balustrade and coloured roof tiles forming bold, geometric designs.

St John the Warrior is one of the few churches to have stayed open after the Revolution and a number of historic works of religious art were transferred here for safekeeping.

These can still be seen in the church and include the 17th-century Icon of the Saviour, which hung in a chapel near the Saviour's Tower in the Kremlin. Across the road is the extremely striking Igumnov House, which was built in 1893 for a rich merchant by Nikolay Pozdeev. It is a typically flamboyant example of Russian-Revival architecture (see p45), and now houses the French Embassy.

The Donskoy Monastery was founded in 1593 by Boris Godunov to honour the Icon of the Donskoy Virgin, credited with having twice saved Moscow from the Mongols. The first time was in 1380 when Prince Dmitriy Donskoy carried the icon into battle at Kulikovo (see p161). Boris Godunov also used it to rally his troops in 1591 against the army of Khan Kazy Girei, which retreated after minor skirmishes.

The crescent moons, below many of the golden crosses on top of the monastery buildings, symbolize the defeat of Islam.

The modest scale of the original monastery is reflected in the beautifully understated Old Cathedral with its bright blue dome and kokosbniki gables (see p44). Two orthodox prelates are buried within: Archbishop Amvrosiy, killed by a mob during a plague riot in 1771, and Patriarch Tikhon, who was imprisoned by the Bolsheviks after the Revolution.

In the late 17th century the monastery acquired greater prestige under the patronage of the Regent Sophia and her lover Golitsyn. The fortified outer walls and New Cathedral are additions from this period.

Built in 1684–98 in the Moscow-Baroque style (see p44), the New Cathedral is a towering brick building with five domes. Inside are a stunning seven-tiered iconostasis and some exuberant frescoes, painted in 1782–5 by Italian artist Antonio Claudio. The Icon of the Donskoy Virgin is now in the Tretyakov Gallery (see pp118–21), but a copy is on show in the Old Cathedral.

THE RUSSIAN ORTHODOX CHURCH

Christianity was adopted as Russia's official religion in AD 988 when Vladimir I (see p17) married the sister of the Byzantine Emperor and had himself baptized in the Orthodox faith. In the 13th century monasteries became a focus for resistance against the invading Mongols. Thereafter the Church played a vital role in Russian life until the Revolution, when it was forced underground. As the Soviet Union broke up, the church revived and, in 1992, Boris Yeltsin became the first Russian leader to attend church services since 1917.

the Russian Orthodox Church, which has offices in its more modern, plainer buildings.

The green-domed Church of the Holy Fathers of the Seven Ecumenical Councils is the oldest of the three churches within the fortified walls. It was founded by Ivan the Terrible (see p18) in the 16th century. The main church, on the first floor, has a 17th-century iconostasis with contemporary icons.

At the heart of the monastery is the elegant yellow Cathedral of the Trinity, designed by Osip Bove (see p45) in 1833 and completed five years later.

The pretty pink bell tower in the northern wall contains the Gate Church of St Simeon the Stylite. It was built in 1730–32, but knocked down in the 1920s. The bells were sold to Harvard University, but have now been restored to the rebuilt gate and bell tower.

Catherine the Great (see p23) bought this tract of land in 1775 and changed its name from Chyornaya Gryaz (Black Mud) to Tsaritsyno (the Tsarina's Village). In doing so, she commissioned one of her most imaginative architects, Vasily Bazhenov (see p44), to design and construct a lavish imperial palace which would rival any found in St Petersburg.

Delicate stone tracery on the Figured Gate at Tsaritsyno

Bazhenov conceived an innovative palace complex combining Gothic, Baroque and even Moorish styles and Catherine approved the plans. She visited the site in 1785 and, although construction was well under way, proclaimed herself dissatisfied. Bazhenov's young colleague Matvey Kazakov (see pp44–5) was told to rebuild the palace but, after a further decade of construction, lack of funds left it still incomplete.

Today the grounds boast charming lakes and woodland walks. Some of the ruins have been restored, but the forlorn remainder have a beauty which the completed palace might never have matched. Although the shell of Kazakov's Grand Palace is the most imposing building on the estate, some of Bazhenov's smaller structures are equally impressive. Visitors can see the Figured Gate with its elegant Gothic-style towers and lancet windows, the Two-storey Opera House, one of the few buildings Catherine approved. The extraordinary Bread Gate, with its arch of sharply pointed stone "teeth", leads to the kitchens, while the Octahedron was built as the servants' quarters. The attractive Church of Our Lady of the Life-Giving Spirit was added in the 19th-century.

A small museum on the estate displays icons, china, glass and some Fabergé eggs, as well as landscapes and architectural exhibits. However, only a fraction of the items in the cellars below the palace are on show at any one time.

The earliest known reference to Kolomenskoe village is in the will of Ivan I (see p18), dated 1339. By the 16th century Kolomenskoe was a favourite country estate of the tsars. The oldest surviving building is the Church of the Ascension, constructed in 1532. A superb wooden palace was built for Tsar Alexis Mikhailovich (see p19) in 1667–71, but it was demolished in the 18th century. After the Revolution the park was designated a museum of architecture, and wooden buildings, such as Peter the Great's cabin from Archangel, were moved here from all over Russia. Also located on the estate is the Front Gate Museum. Its exhibits include a model of Tsar Alexis' palace and Russian craft objects, such as tile paintings and woodcarvings.

MODEL OF WOODEN PALACE

Kolomenskoe underwent a major expansion during the reign of Tsar Alexis Mikhailovich, father of Peter the Great. He added a new centrepiece, an astonishing wooden palace with fanciful barrel-shaped roofs, onion domes and carved ornamentation, which visiting diplomats described as the "eighth wonder of the world". It was demolished in 1768 on the orders of Catherine the Great. Fortunately she had a model made, which is now displayed in the Front Gate Museum.

The Falcon Tower was constructed in 1627. It was used as a water tower.

The Metropolitan originally resided in the Kremlin, but after the creation of the patriarchate in the 16th century the bishops of Krutitsy became metropolitans (see p56). The Mission's name derives from the Russian krutoy, meaning steep, and refers to the nearby bank of the Moskva river.

The Baroque buildings seen today are undergoing restoration and are dominated by the bulky Cathedral of the Assumption, which was built in 1685. The entire edifice, including the onion domes, is built of bricks.

A covered gallery links the cathedral to the Metropolitan's Palace via a double-arched gateway topped by a small pavilion or teremok. The gallery and pavilion are by Osip Startsev, who was famous in Russia in the late 17th century as a designer of religious buildings. The northern façade of the teremok is decorated with intricately carved window frames and turquoise tiles with yellow floral motifs.

The Metropolitan's Palace is a handsome, though plainer, red brick building with pyramidal chimneys and an impressive staircase at the rear. Since falling into disrepair early in the 19th century, the Mission has served as a barracks, a prison and, after the Travelling back from the city of Constantinople in 1360, Metropolitan Aleksey survived a storm at sea. To give thanks he founded the Monastery of the Saviour on the banks of the Yauza river.

He then appointed the monk Andronicus to be the first abbot and to oversee the building works.

The best-known monk to have lived here was Andrey Rublev, Russia's most brilliant icon painter (see p61). He is thought to have died and been buried here in about 1430, but the location of his grave is unknown. Rublev is commemorated by Highlights include the 17th-century Icon of the Tikhvin Virgin, originally from the Donskoy Monastery (see p136), and paintings depicting the life of St Nicholas of Zaraysk, one of Russia's favourite saints. The 18th-century monks' building, which contained monks' cells, is being renovated and will provide further gallery space.

The beautiful, single-domed Cathedral of the Saviour was built in either 1390 or 1425–7. If the former date is correct, this would make it the oldest church in Moscow. The interior was painted by Rublev but only traces of his work survive, around the altar windows.

M Izmaylovskiy Park, Shosse
Entuziastov. ☐ 24 hours. ♿

One of the largest parks in Europe, Izmaylovo covers nearly 12 sq km (4.7 sq miles). It features attractions such as sports facilities, children's amusements, cafés and woods, as well as an outdoor theatre, a famous flea market (see p193), a cathedral and the picturesque remains of one of the tsars' country estates.

Izmaylovo passed to the Romanov family in the 16th century and became one of their favourite hunting lodges. In 1663, Tsar Alexis (see p19) built an enormous wooden palace here and dedicated the land to experiments in animal and vegetable husbandry and various cottage industries.

Peter the Great later spent an idyllic childhood at Izmaylovo, secluded from palace intrigues. It was here that his lifelong fascination with the sea began, when he learned to sail an old boat on a lake. The boat was later nicknamed the "grandfather of the Russian navy".

The wooden palace has long since disappeared, demolished by Catherine the Great in 1767. However, about 500 m (550 yds) east of Izmaylovskiy Park metro, the remains of other buildings can be seen on an island near the sports stadium. The lake surrounding them was once part of a network of 37 ponds previously created by Tsar Alexis for breeding fish and irrigating experimental crops. He planted exotic species such as mulberry trees and cotton and ordered seeds from his ambassadors in England.

17th-century Cathedral of the Intercession, Izmaylovo Park

The island is reached over a small bridge. The iron archway at its far end was built in 1859 and led to three buildings commissioned by Nicholas I and designed by Konstantin Ton (see p45) in the 1840s for retired soldiers. Rising above the trees ahead, behind the remains of the estate's walls, are the five, formidable black domes of the Cathedral of the Intercession, built in 1671–9. The domes are tiled with metallic "scales". The zakomary gables (see p44) beneath them are beautifully decorated with "peacock's eye" tiles, by Stepan Polubes, a late 17th-century Belorussian ceramicist working in Moscow.

On the cathedral's right is a tiered red-brick arch with a tent roof. Built in 1671, this is the Bridge Tower, all that remains of a 14-span bridge that once crossed the estate's extensive waterways. Its tower was used for meetings of the boyars' council under Tsar Alexis. The top tier of the bridge gives fine views over the whole estate.

On the opposite side of the cathedral from the Bridge Tower stands the white, triple-arched Ceremonial Gate. It was designed by Terentyi Makarov. In 1682 and is one of two gates that originally led to the palace.

The flea market, just to the northwest of the lake, trails down the hill from the concrete tower blocks of the Izmaylovo Hotel, offering an amazingly eclectic variety of goods. Muscovites come here in large numbers to buy items such as second-hand household goods and vehicle parts. Tourists are likely to be greeted by a storm of shouts in English from people selling their wares.

Kuskovo 16

КУСКОВО

Kuskovo

Statue of Minerva

For over 200 years before the Revolution, Kuskovo was the country seat of one of Russia's wealthiest aristocratic families, the Sheremetevs. The present buildings were commissioned by Count Pyotr Sheremetev after his marriage to the heiress Varvara Cherkasskaya in 1743. Among their 200,000 serfs were the architects Fyodor Argunov and Aleksey Mironov who played a major role in Kuskovo's construction, probably under the supervision of professional architect Karl Blank. Apart from the elaborate gardens, the main attraction is the two-storey wooden palace, completed in 1777. A ceramics museum, with a Renowned collection of porcelain, occupies the Orangery.

★ Formal Gardens

The gardens were laid out in the French, geometrical style, which led to Kuskovo gaining a reputation as the Russian Versailles.

The Hermitage has distinctive rounded walls and is topped by a dome.

Church of the Archangel Michael

Constructed in 1737–8, the church is the oldest building on the estate. The statue on its dome is of the Archangel Michael. The wooden bell tower and golden spire were added in 1792.

The Dutch Cottage was built in 1749 in the homely style of 17th-century Dutch architecture, in red brick and with stepped gables. The tiled interiors house Russian ceramics and glassware.

The Swiss Cottage resembles a traditional Alpine chalet. It was designed by Nikolay Benoit in 1870.

★ Orangery

With a central ball for dining and dancing, the Orangery was built in 1761–2. It is now a ceramics museum, based on the 18th–19th-century porcelain collection of Aleksey Morozov (see p96). Pieces on show include Wedgwood, Meissen and items from various Russian factories.

The three railway stations on this large square are long-standing rivals for the affection of Muscovites. The oldest, Leningradskiy station (formerly Nikolaevskiy station), opened in 1851, serving as the terminus of the line from St Petersburg to Moscow. The building was designed according to the tenets of historicism by Konstantin Ton (see p45), architect of the Great Kremlin Palace (see p63).

In complete contrast is the turreted Yaroslavskiy station, rebuilt in 1902 by architect Fyodor Shekhtel (see p45). The station is a colourful Style-Moderne building with a tiled frieze and an unusual, steeply pitched roof. The Trans-Siberian Railway starts here.

Shekhtel's radical design for his station goaded his rival, Aleksey Shchusev (see p45), into adopting an equally bold approach when designing the third station, Kazanskiy, on the opposite side of the square. Begun in 1912, the station has a tiered central tower modelled on the citadel in the Mongol capital Kazan. The terminal was completed in 1926 and serves the Urals.

The porticoed pavilion of Komsomolskaya metro station (see pp39–41) is also a striking feature of the square. It is named after the Komsomol (Communist Youth volunteers) who helped to build it. It has a luxurious interior, lit by glittering chandeliers.

Komsomolskaya ploshchad itself is a seething mass of beggars, families with apparently everything they own in tow, street hawkers, drunks, drug dealers and, in the evenings, prostitutes. Over recent years it has assumed an unnerving atmosphere to say the least, so it is advisable not to linger here long, especially at night.

A graphic artist, sculptor, painter, theatre designer and architect, Viktor Vasnetsov (1848–1926) was a member of the artists' colony set up by arts patron Savva Mamontov at Abramtsevo (see p160). He is probably best known for the highly original façade of the Tretyakov Gallery (see pp118–21), where many of his paintings are also housed.

Ornate roof of the wooden house designed by Viktor Vasnetsov

Vasnetsov designed this unusual house for himself and his family in 1893–4 and lived here until he died in 1926, at the age of 78. As an enthusiastic advocate of traditional Russian folk art and architecture, he employed peasant carpenters from Vladimir (see pp166–7) to build his remarkable, log-cabin-like, timber house with green roofs.

The ground-floor rooms display highly individual pieces of furniture, many designed by Vasnetsov and his similarly talented younger brother, Apollinariy (1856–1933). The stoves are decorated with colourful tiles made by fellow artists from Abramtsevo.

A spiral staircase hung with 17th-century chain mail and weaponry leads up to the artist's studio, which resembles a vaulted medieval hall. This is the perfect backdrop for Vasnetsov's arresting canvases, many of which take figures from Russian legends as their subjects. For example, Baba Yaga portrays Russia's forest witch indulging in her favourite occupation, stealing children. The enormous painting of The Sleeping Princess, painted in the last year of Vasnetsov's life, shows a scene from the classic fairy story of Sleeping Beauty.

Like the estate at Kuskovo (see pp142–3), Ostankino was built by the serf architects Pavel Argunov and Aleksey Mironov for the Sheremetevs, one of Russia's richest families. Count Nikolay Sheremetev was a prominent patron of the arts and built his palace around a theatre, where a company of 200 serf actors and actresses performed plays of his choosing. In 1800 the Count married Praskovia Zhemchugova-Kovaleva, one of the actresses. Secluded at their palace, they were able to shelter themselves from the disapproval of polite society, but sadly Praskovia died three years later. The count never recovered from the loss and left the palace, which fell into disuse.

Ostankino is a handsome palace, with a shallow green dome and impressive classical 18th century interiors. The main building has an admirably restrained Neo-Classical façade. It was built in wood in 1792–8 and skilfully plastered over to look like brick and stone. It demonstrates the remarkable workmanship of Sheremetev's serf craftsmen. The halls are a wonder of trompe l'oeil decor. Carved wooden mouldings are painted to resemble bronze, gold and marble, parquet floors are patterned in birchwood and mahogany, while a huge crystal chandelier hangs from the frescoed ceiling of the main hall. The pavilion also serves as a sculpture gallery and among the sculptures is a Roman marble head of Aphrodite from the 1st century AD.

The pièce de résistance of the palace is the theatre, a breathtaking, elliptical hall with a superb painted ceiling supported by rows of Corinthian columns. In 1796 the building was partly reconstructed to allow the installation of an ingenious mechanical device which raised the auditorium floor so that the theatre could also be used as a ballroom. In the summer, concerts of classical music are still held here.

On the road leading from the estate is the ornate Church of the Trinity with a cluster of green domes. It was built in 1678–83 for the Cherkasskiy family, who owned Ostankino estate before the Sheremetevs.

One of the city's main tourist attractions in Soviet times, the former Exhibition of Economic Achievements of the USSR (VDNKh) has now become the All-Russian Exhibition Centre (VVTs), a vast park and exhibition site. VVTs remains a fascinating place for a visit, especially for enthusiasts of Soviet architecture. There are scores of massive pavilions, including a Pavilion of the Peoples of the USSR, guarded by a statue of Lenin.

The main entrance to the park is a huge triumphal arch, topped by the figures of a tractor driver and female collective farmer, holding up a sheaf of corn. To the right of this is the most famous statue in VVTs, Vera Mukhina's award-winning Worker and Woman Collective Farm Worker (1937), which appeared at the beginning of all Mosfilm Soviet-era films.

In the centre of the complex is the Fountain of the Republics, consisting of 15 figures in national dress representing the former Soviet republics – nearby, look out for the space rocket, which is occasionally open for visits, outside Pavilion 32.

Nearby is the entrance to the Botanical Gardens, which contain a small but pleasant Japanese Garden where tea is served. There are also numerous ponds and picnic spots.

Heading back towards VDNKh Metro, it is hard to avoid the Space Obelisk. Over 100 m (328 ft) high, it represents a rocket lifting off. It was erected in 1964, three years after Yuriy Gagarin's historic flight. Underneath it is the Space Museum, one of Moscow's hidden treasures, containing Belka and Strelka (stuffed), the two dogs who were the first creatures to come back alive from space (Laika, more famous in the West, died), and Vostok 1, the tiny capsule in which Gagarin famously orbited the Earth.

TWO GUIDED WALKS

Modern Moscow is, in many respects, the brainchild of Stalin. A sprawling city of around 10 million people, it is not a place that lends itself easily to a casual stroll. Stalin intended the city to awe, tearing down churches and any other buildings that got in the way of his plan for a Socialist megapolopolis, and the capital's wide streets and imposing structures are a testament to his vision. Walking through Moscow, one can feel dwarfed by buildings that seem to have been designed for a larger race of being. One of the joys of life in the city, however, is finding a quiet, forgotten corner, an unexpected moment of calm amid the bustle of city life. The two walks that follow present two very different aspects of the Russian capital. The first explores Moscow's busy centre, passing some often neglected, yet fascinating sights from both Russia's recent and distant past including the former headquarters of the KGB. The second walk provides a journey through Russian literature, from the giant statue of Dostoevsky outside the Russian State Library, to Patriach's Pond, straight from the pages of a modern Soviet classic.

A One-Hour Stroll Through Central Moscow

Like any major capital, Moscow is a busy place and full of life. This walk, along the quieter embankments and older streets, is a chance to explore the city's ancient heart, while avoiding many of the busier sections. Taking in such varied sights as the recreated Cathedral of Christ the Redeemer, Red Square and the former KGB HQ, the route provides an excellent opportunity to appreciate Moscow's rich and eventful history of the distant, as well as more recent, past.

Along the Moscow River

The gilded dome of the Cathedral of Christ the Redeemer ① (see p74) is immediately visible on exiting from Kropotkinskaya station. The original 19th-century cathedral was blown up on the orders of Stalin in 1931. This modern replica was completed in 1997. Explore the grounds to find a statue of Tsar Alexander I ②. After leaving the cathedral grounds turn left and walk along the embankment of the Moskva river, passing under Bolshoy Kamenny Bridge. After the bridge turn left again in the direction of the Kremlin, and then cross the road at the traffic lights, under the watchful eyes of Moscow's traffic police. The guarded gate is Borovitskaya Tower ③, the presidential entrance to the Kremlin. When the President, or any other important figure, arrives traffic is held up throughout Moscow to allow the entourage, with its flashing blue lights, a clear road.

Around Alexander Gardens

Next, follow the path-way through Alexander Gardens ④ (see p67) past the Kremlin walls and turrets, including Trinity Tower ⑤ (see p56), the tallest of the Kremlin's fortifications. The gardens contain a number of cafés and the paths are a favourite place for Muscovites to take a stroll when the weather is fine. Look out for the fountains with characters from Russian fairy tales set against the wall of the shopping complex at the northern end of the gardens. Close to the park's exit are the monuments to the Hero Cities of the Soviet Union ⑥ (Moscow, Leningrad, Kursk, etc.). They commemorate the bravery of the citizens of those cities that bore the brunt of the fighting during World War II. Next to these monuments is the Tomb of the Unknown Soldier, dedicated to the millions of Soviet soldiers who died in the battle against Fascism. Newly-married couples often come here to pay homage to the fallen. Leaving Alexander Gardens, look to the right for an unusual view of Red Square ⑦ (see p106). Walking on, the statue of the earnest looking military man astride a horse is Marshal Georgiy Zhukov ⑧, the stout defender of Stalingrad and leader of the Soviet forces during the Battle of Kursk in 1943, the largest tank battle of World War II.

Continue past the statue of Zhukov for Resurrection Gate ⑨ (see p105) and another stunning view of Red Square. Walk through the gate: to the left is Kazan Cathedral ⑩ (see p105), a 1990s replica of the original, which, like the Cathedral of Christ the Redeemer, was destroyed on Stalin's orders in 1936. Head back through Resurrection Gate and turn right.

From Ploshchad Revolyutsii to Lubyanka

Walk across to Ploshchad Revolyutsii (Revolution Square) to find the chunky statue of Karl Marx (11). The inscription at the statue's base, urging the workers of the world to unite, grows more incongruous year by year as capitalism becomes on summer days. It is also occasionally the site of demonstrations.

Next head up Teatralny proezd to No 5, where a huge assortment of toys for young and old is on sale at Detskiy Mir (13) (see p193), the largest and most famous toy shop in Russia. A short distance away from this house of fun is Lubyanka Square (see p112), and, on it, the HQ of the former KGB (14). Here, during Communist Russia's darkest days, the state security agency carried out many of its interrogations. A plaque to Yuriy Andropov, the former Soviet General Secretary and KGB chief, is near the entrance. A statue of Feliks Dzerzhinskiy, founder of the Cheka (forerunners to the KGB), once stood in the square until it was toppled in 1991 by cheering crowds in one of the most symbolic events to take place during the death throes of the USSR. In a move that many have seen as equally symbolic, a plaque to Dzerzhinskiy has recently been placed within the grounds of what is now the main economic model in Russia. Opposite Marx is the world famous Bolshoy Theatre (12) (see pp190-91), which has recently undergone extensive internal and external reconstruction. Head towards the theatre, crossing the road via the underpass to the right. Teatralnaya ploshchad is a favourite place for local workers to sit and eat lunch the HQ of the modern state security service, the FSB. To the right, on Lubyanskiy proezd, is the Mayakovsky Museum (15) (see p111), dedicated to the life of Vladimir Mayakovsky. One of Stalin's favourite poets, Mayakovsky eventually became disillusioned with Communism and committed suicide in this very building. It is a short walk from here to Lubyanka metro station.

TIPS FOR WALKERS

Getting there: Kropotkinskaya metro station.

Stopping-off points: There are plenty of cafés and places to sit in Alexander Gardens.

A 90-Minute Literary Walk

Russia has long been revered for its writers and Moscow is dotted with statues, monuments and other reminders of them. This walk highlights not only the well-known giants of Russian literature, such as Dostoevsky, but also lesser known yet important literary figures such as Pushkin, the father of Russian literature, Yesenin, a young idealist poet who took his own life, and Bulgakov, author of The Master and Margarita, a novel that conjures up a strange reality in which Moscow is visited by the devil himself. As well as sights directly relating to Russian literature, this walk also passes by other places of interest including theatres and newspaper offices.

Giant statue of Dostoevsky outside the Russian State Library ③

The Republics' Tree to the Morozov Mansion

Arriving at Borovitskaya metro station, take the city exit. Next to the stairs leading to the escalators is The Republics' Tree ①, a mural depicting the peoples of the 15 former Soviet republics in national costume. Take the escalators to street level. Turn left and follow the road to the corner for a view of the Manège ② (see p94), an exhibition hall that was partially destroyed in a mysterious fire in 2005. To the left is the Russian State Library ③, and, outside it, the brooding figure of Fyodor Dostoevsky (1821–81), the prolific writer who helped to shape the 20th-century novel in works such as Crime and Punishment (1866).

Further on, at No 5, is the Shchusev Museum of Architecture ④, a former Bolshevik HQ. Continuing on, cross the road via the underpass to the glitzy House of Friendship ⑤ (see p95). Next to it is the 19th-century neo-Gothic Morozov Mansion ⑥ (see p96).

From Nikitskiy bulvar to Pushkin Square

Turning into Nikitskiy bulvar, cross the road to No 7b ⑦, where Nikolai Gogol (1809–52), author of the classic novel Dead Souls (1842), lived out his final years. It was here that he wrote the second volume of Dead Souls, but, having fallen under the influence of a religious fanatic, he destroyed the manuscript. Cross back over the road at the pedestrian crossing, pass the Museum of Eastern Peoples ⑧ at No 12a, and then walk to the end of the road. The building opposite is ITAR-TASS ⑨, the Russian state news agency and the mouthpiece of the Communist Party in Soviet times. To the left is a statue of botanist and thinker Kliment Timiryazev ⑩.

Carry on up Tverskoy bulvar to the statue of the poet Sergey Yesenin ⑪. Born in 1895, he is best known for Pugachev (1922), a verse tragedy dealing with the peasant rebellion of 1773–75. Yesenin had a troubled life, including an unhappy marriage to the American dancer Isadora Duncan, and killed himself in 1925.

Facing each other, slightly further up the road at Nos 22 and 23 respectively, are the MXAT Gor'ky Art Theatre ⑫, named for Maxim Gor'ky, the dramatist founder of Socialist Realism, and the Pushkin Theatre ⑬. At the end of the road, take the underpass and follow the tunnel to the left to enter Pushkin Square ⑭ where there is a monument to Alexander Pushkin (1799–1837). Comparatively little-known in the West, Pushkin is a hero of Russian literature. Eugene Onegin (1830), his novel in verse, is held by many critics to be the greatest masterpiece of Russian literature (see p73).

Tverskaya ulitsa to Mayakovskaya Metro

Continue up Tverskaya ulitsa. On the right hand side of the street, at No 18a, look out for a plaque (in Russian) noting that this was where Lenin's wife worked on the Pravda newspaper ⑬.

Patriarch's Pond, one of the city's most popular picnic spots ⑳

Across the street, at No 21, stands the red-bricked Museum of the Revolution, now renamed the Museum of Modern History ⑯ (see p97). At the end of Tverskaya ulitsa, use the underpass to cross over to the statue of Vladimir Mayakovskiy ⑰ (1893–1930). A poet of the revolution, Mayakovskiy was one of the few writers permitted to travel abroad during the Soviet crack-down. He was a favourite of Stalin, who proclaimed that indifference to his works was a crime (see p111). South of the statue is the Tchaikovsky Concert Hall ⑱ (see p200), named after the composer of The Nutcracker. Heading down Bolshaya Sadovaya ulitsa, walk into the courtyard at No 10 to pay a visit to the Bulgakov Flat-Museum ⑲ (see p96). Never a supporter of the Soviet regime, most of Mikhail Bulgakov's work was suppressed during his lifetime. Continue on, taking the first left to reach Patriarch's Pond ⑳. This is the setting for the opening of Bulgakov's The Master and Margarita, where Satan makes his first appearance. From here, head back to Mayakovskaya metro station.

The magnificence of some of the palaces and churches outside Moscow and the historic interest of some of the towns make excursions there justly rewarding. Although parts of the landscape are unappealingly industrial, the large areas of true countryside are green, forested and dotted with villages of small wooden dachas.

Visitors may find it a good idea to take an organized tour (see p206) to out-of-town sights as public transport can be erratic, though perfectly feasible for those who prefer mixing with local daily life (see p227). There are several places of historic and cultural importance within easy reach of the city. To the west is Borodino (see p158), site of the great battle between Napoleon's army and Russian forces under the command of Field Marshal Mikhail Kutuzov. To the north is the magnificent Trinity Monastery of St Sergius (see pp162-5) and to the northeast the towns of the Golden Ring (see p161). The political heyday of these towns was in the 12th and 13th centuries, before the rise of Moscow, and their churches and wooden buildings make them well worth exploring.

Field Marshal
Mikhail Kutuzov

Also outside Moscow are houses lived in by two of Russia's most famous sons, Pyotr Tchaikovsky (see p159) and Leo Tolstoy (see p134).

On Friday nights the trains and roads into the countryside are packed with families travelling to their dacha, a migration that leaves the capital rather deserted. Each dacha has a small plot of land that is used for growing fruit and vegetables. For some Muscovites this was, and often still is today, an essential source of food. In the last few years, brick houses have started to spring up where farmers used to grow crops, built for New Russians who have adopted Western commuter habits. However, many have been abandoned half-built as construction firms have gone out of business in the fast-changing economic climate.

Exploring the Moscow Region

Despite the numerous attractions of Moscow, it is well worth spending time in the surrounding region. Several country estates lie within easy reach of the city and make for delightful one- or two-day trips. Among them are Yasnaya Polyana, where Leo Tolstoy (see p134) lived for many years, the house in Klin rented by Pyotr Tchaikovsky (see p159) and Abramtsevo Estate-Museum, a former artists' colony. However, the star attraction of the region is the Trinity Monastery of St Sergius. Once a place of pilgrimage for the tsars, this huge complex has several superb cathedrals.

Moscow is also an ideal base for visiting the Golden Ring towns, which include Pereslavl-Zaleskiy, Suzdal and Vladimir. Founded by Russians seeking shelter from invading tribes, these attractive settlements still have many historic buildings.

GETTING AROUND

While some sights on the map, such as Pereslavl-Zaleskiy, can be visited in a day, a trip to Suzdal, Vladimir or Yasnaya Polyana will take at least two days. Sights are served by a mixture of trains, buses and coaches (see p227). For more adventurous travellers the extensive road network offers an alternative means of getting to sights, but this too has its problems (see p226). One of the best ways to visit sights outside Moscow is on an organized tour (see p206).

Most of the buildings on this country estate date from the 18th and 19th centuries. The charming Church of the Archangel Michael was completed in 1667, however, and gives the estate its name.

The Golitsyn family acquired the estate in 1703. In the 1780s Prince Nikolay Golitsyn began a wholesale rebuilding, including a new palace which was built to a design by the French architect Charles de Guerne. Constructed from wood, it was covered with stucco to give the effect of stone. When Golitsyn died in 1809, the estate was purchased by Prince Nikolay Yusupov. Recently restored, the palace's sumptuous rooms are filled with fine furniture, fabrics and antiques. There is also an excellent art collection.

The formal gardens were laid out in the 18th century. Within them stand pavilions such as the diminutive Caprice Palace, built in 1819 for soirees. In 1910–16 a lavish mausoleum was erected for the Yusupov family, but it was never used because of the Revolution.

One of the fiercest military confrontations of the 19th century took place at Borodino on 7 September 1812. For over 15 hours Napoleon Bonaparte's Grande Armée and the Russian army, led by Field Marshal Mikhail Kutuzov, fought each other to a bloody impasse. It is estimated that 40,000 Russian and 30,000 French soldiers were killed. Napoleon called it the “most terrible” of all his battles, but claimed victory on the grounds that the Russians were forced to continue their retreat to Moscow. Posterity, however, awarded the laurels to the Russians. The French followed the Russians, but arrived to find the city and the Kremlin deserted. The Muscovites then started a great fire (see pp24–5) in the city, and faced with a Russian winter in the open, the French were finally forced to retreat.

The battlefield covers over 100 sq km (40sq miles), but the main places of interest are reasonably accessible. A museum, 1 km (½ mile) south of Borodino village, recounts the story of the battle with the aid of models and an illuminated map. More than 30 monuments are strewn around the area. Russia's most distinguished general to fall in battle, Prince Pyotr Bagration, was buried at the base of a column dedicated to the fallen just east of the museum. Nearby is the inn, now a museum, where Leo Tolstoy stayed to research the background for his epic novel War and Peace. The small Empire-style Spasskiy Church of 1822 was the first monument to be constructed on the battlefield. A re-enactment of the battle takes place every 7 September.

In a letter to his brother Anatoly in May 1892 Pyotr Tchaikovsky wrote, “I have rented a house in Klin. What a blessing it is to know that no-one will come, either to interrupt my work, or my reading or walking”. Previous stays in the village of Frolovskoe near Klin had inspired some of his best music, including the ballets The Sleeping Beauty and The Nutcracker, and the opera The Queen of Spades based on Pushkin’s novel (see p73). Tchaikovsky enjoyed Klin for only a few months, as he died in 1893. In 1894 his younger brother, Modest, opened the estate to visitors. The ground

Also open to visitors are the handsome wood-panelled library and the study where Modest Tchaikovsky worked as the Klin archivist until his death in 1916. A memorial room to the composer holds some of his personal possessions, including his top hat, gloves and evening clothes.

Tchaikovsky habitually took a stroll in the garden before breakfast and after lunch. His favourite flowers, lilies of the valley, are still planted here. Concerts are held year round in a hall built in the grounds.

PYOTR TCHAIKOVSKY

Probably Russia’s most famous composer, Tchaikovsky was born in 1840. After graduating initially in law, he studied music at the St Petersburg Conservatory. One of his teachers helped the young composer to get a job teaching music at the Moscow Conservatory (see p94) in 1866 where he then taught for the next 12 years. It was during this period that Tchaikovsky composed his first four symphonies and the ballet Swan Lake (1876). In 1877 he married a student from the Conservatory in an effort to suppress his homosexuality.

However, the marriage was unhappy and short-lived. Tchaikovsky composed prolifically in the 1880s, completing such works as the ballet The Sleeping Beauty (1889) and the overture The Year 1812 (1880). In 1892 he moved to Klin, outside Moscow. He died of cholera in November 1893, while overseeing the premiere of his final work, the Sixth Symphony, in St Petersburg. It is rumoured that he drank infected water as a dignified form of suicide after the exposure of his homosexual affair with a young aristocrat.

In the second half of the 19th century this delightful rural retreat became a hive of cultural activity. Until his death in 1859, the house was owned by the writer Sergey Aksakov, whose sons were leading Slavophile thinkers. The estate's creative legacy was continued in 1870 when it was acquired by Savva Mamontov, an industrialist and art patron. Mamontov's generosity and zeal led to the establishment of an artists' colony here, and to a re-evaluation of traditional Russian folk art and craftwork. The work of local peasant craftsmen, whose children were educated in the estate's school, was a source of inspiration for many of the artists.

Dotted around the estate are a number of remarkable buildings. The artists' studio, with a spectacular carved roof, was designed in 1872 by Viktor Gartman. Displayed here are ceramics by the two distinguished artists Valentin Serov and Mikhail Vrubel. The teremok, meanwhile, is a free improvisation on the typical peasant hut (izba), and was originally built as a bathhouse by Ivan Ropot in 1873. It was later used as a guesthouse. Inside are the original wooden furnishings and ornaments, such as statuettes, kitchen utensils and a tiled stove.

The House on Chicken Legs stands on stilts. Designed by Viktor Vasnetsov, it is now a popular children's attraction, recalling the witch of Russian folklore, Baba Yaga, whose house in the forest is built on giant chicken legs.

A woodland path leads to the most remarkable building on the estate. The Church of the Saviour Not Made by Human Hand is modelled on the medieval churches of Novgorod, but was brought up to date by the addition of bands of painted majolica tiles to its walls of white-washed brick. The church was built in 1881–2, to a design by Viktor Vasnetsov; the mosaic floor is also his work, while the icons were painted by Vasnetsov, Ilya Repin and his wife Vera, Vasilii Polenov and Nikolay Nevrev. A small oratory holds Savva Mamontov's remains and those of his son Andrey, who died, aged 19, in 1891.

by Mamontov out of respect for his predecessor. Aksakov knew the novelists Nikolai Gogol and Ivan Turgenev, and here, in the red sitting-room, Gogol would read aloud from his masterpiece, Dead Souls. The dining room features a beautiful, tiled corner fireplace and a profusion of paintings. The gaze, however, is drawn to a copy of Valentin Serov's arresting portrait of Vera, Savva Mamontov's daughter, seated at the dining table. Entitled Girl with Peaches (1887), the original can be found in the Tretyakov Gallery (see p121).

The History of the Golden Ring

The first important cities in Russia were Novgorod in the north and Kiev in the south, which were situated on trade routes connecting the Baltic and the Black Sea. From the 11th century, as hostile tribes invaded Kievan Rus (see p17) and many Russians were forced northward, new settlements were founded such as Rostov, Yaroslavl, Vladimir and Suzdal. Like Novgorod and Kiev, these towns flourished on trade from Western 16th-century icon from the Golden Ring

Europe, Byzantium and Central Asia, while Sergiev Posad, location of the Trinity Monastery of St Sergius (see pp162–5), became an important centre for the Orthodox Church. Moscow was also founded during this era (see p17) and, by the 16th century, had become Russia's capital. By this time the cluster of towns northeast of Moscow had paled into insignificance, although in the 1960s their historic importance brought them the title the Golden Ring.

THE GOLDEN RING

Prince Vladimir Monomakh (see p59) founded a small trading settlement in the late 11th century.

It was named Vladimir in 1108. Monomakh's son, Yuriy Dolgorukiy (see p17), expanded the town and it was later the capital of Northern Rus.

Andrey Bogolyubskiy, the son of Yuriy Dolgorukiy, moved his court to Vladimir in 1157, where his craftsmen were to recreate the splendour of Kiev. His boyars later murdered him for being a dictator.

A campaign by Suzdal against Novgorod in 1169 is the subject of this icon. Created by the 15th-century Novgorod School (see p61), it recalls Suzdal's strength before Moscow became pre-eminent.

Dmitriy Donskoy

The Battle of Kulikovo (see p18), in 1380, was a turning point in the history of the Golden Ring. The Mongols made many inroads into the area, sacking Suzdal in 1238 and demanding tribute from the Russians. Dmitriy Donskoy (see p18) won a decisive victory against them at Kulikovo, with a blessing, it is said, from monk Sergius of Radonezh (see p165).

Many churches were built in the towns of the Golden Ring, a sign of their comparative wealth. Some wooden churches are preserved in a museum at Suzdal (see p166).

In 1608–10, during the Time of Troubles (see p19), the monks survived a siege by the Polish army and in the 1680s the young Peter the Great found refuge here during the Streltsy Rebellion (see p22). The monastery was closed down by the Communists in 1919, but was allowed to open again in 1946, when it became headquarters of the Russian Orthodox Church. The headquarters transferred to new premises at the Danilovskiy Monastery (see pp136–7) in 1988.

Exploring the Trinity Monastery of St Sergius

In the 14th century, Sergius of Radonezh built a small wooden church in the forests to the north of Moscow and consecrated it to the Holy Trinity. Many pilgrims were attracted to the site by reports of Sergius' piety. He organized them into a community and the Trinity Monastery was born. The monastery expanded as it gained wealth and influence and today the huge complex is enclosed by white walls around 1.6 km (1 mile) long. Its stunning churches, grouped around the spectacular Cathedral of the Assumption, are among the most beautiful in Russia.

Church of St Sergius and Refectory

The monks' refectory was built in 1686–92 using money donated by Peter the Great and his half-brother, Ivan V, in gratitude for the refuge given them by the monastery during the Streltsy Rebellion (see p22).

The exterior walls are divided into a series of panels, topped by carved scallop shells and separated by pillars decorated with sculpted vines. Each panel is painted so that it looks as though it has three-dimensional facets similar to those of the Faceted Palace (see p62) in the Kremlin. The refectory's main façade features a covered terrace with a wealth of ornamentation. At the eastern end of the refectory is the Church of St Sergius. Its iconostasis was brought here from Moscow's Church of St Nicholas on Ilinka in 1688. Delicate fretwork on the iconostasis seems to be metal, but is actually made of wood.

Cathedral of the Assumption

This magnificent cathedral, with its central golden cupola surrounded by four blue, star-spangled domes, is located at the heart of the monastery. Ivan the Terrible commissioned the cathedral in 1559 to celebrate his defeat of the Mongols at Kazan (see p19). It was completed 26 years later to a design inspired by Aristotele Fioravanti's Cathedral of the Assumption (see pp58–9) in the Kremlin. Painters from the acclaimed Yaroslavl school of artists, led by Dmitry Grigorev, took just 100 days to decorate the lofty interior in 1684. Their names are inscribed beneath a fresco of the Last Judgement on the west wall. The sumptuous five-tiered iconostasis dates from the same period but incorporates a number of icons from the 16th century.

Trinity Cathedral

This exquisite white cathedral is decorated with kokoshniki gables (see p44) above a triple-banded frieze and is the oldest stone building in the monastery. It was built over the tomb of St Sergius in 1422, the year of his canonization. St Sergius' remains are now encased in a silver shrine inside the cathedral and are still a focus for visiting pilgrims.

The original decoration of the interior was the work of master artists Andrey Rublev and Daniil Chernyy. Most of their frescoes have since been painted over. Their iconostasis has survived, but Rublev's icon The Trinity (1420s) is a copy. The original is in the Tretyakov Gallery (see pp118–21). Also in the iconostasis are two icons by renowned painter Simon Ushakov: The Holy Face (1674) and Christ Enthroned (1684).

Other Churches

There are five smaller churches within the monastery walls. The oldest is the Church of the Holy Spirit, built in 1476 by craftsmen from Pskov (see p44), a town to the northwest of Moscow. The infirmary and its adjoining tent-roofed Church of SS Zosima and Savvatiy were constructed in 1635–8.

The Chapel Over the Well was built at the end of the 17th century over a holy spring. The open rotunda next to it was added in the 19th century. Pilgrims still come to fill bottles with holy water from the spring beneath the rotunda.

Just in front of the Church of St Sergius stands the small Church of St Micah. This single-domed church is named after one of St Sergius' pupils, who is buried beneath it.

The Baroque Church of the Virgin of Smolensk, a small, blue and white rotunda, was

THE HOLIEST MONK

Sergius of Radonezh (c.1319–92) was born into a noble family but, with his brother, withdrew from the world and founded the Trinity Monastery.

Sergius was instrumental in encouraging Russia's princes to unite against the Mongol invaders and, in 1380, Prince Dmitriy Donskoy, commander of the Russian army, asked for his blessing before attacking the Mongols at Kulikovo (see p161). The Russian victory, along with the discovery that Sergius' body was miraculously unharmed in a Mongol attack on the monastery in 1408, led to Sergius' canonization in 1422.

Palaces and Museums

Gifts from the tsars are among the monastic treasures in the former Sacristy and Treasury. Visitors can see jewelled icon covers, exquisite crosses, icons, gospels in gilded covers, vestments and some wonderful tapestries, including the pall from the coffin of St Sergius.

Built in the late 17th century for Tsar Alexis Mikhailovich, the Tsar's Apartments are now used as a theological college. Parts of the slightly shabby exterior are painted to appear faceted. In the southwest corner of the monastery is the 18th-century Palace of the Metropolitans. It was the first of the buildings to come back into religious use when the Soviets allowed the patriarchs and metropolitans to return in 1946.

Towers and Gate Churches

The Trinity Monastery was originally fortified in the reign of Ivan the Terrible (see p18). Its formidable walls are 12 m (39 ft) high and date, in their present form, from the early 17th century. The monastery's main gate is in the Beautiful Tower. The frescoes on its archway depict the life of St Sergius. Behind the Beautiful Tower is the red-brick Gate Church of St John the Baptist.

At the north end of the walls is the Duck Tower, so called because Peter the Great shot ducks from its windows. The spire, with its carved duck, and the upper tiers were added in 1672–86.

The soaring, five-tiered, blue and white bell tower was built between 1741 and 1769.

Nestling on the banks of the Kamenka river, Suzdal is the best preserved of the Golden Ring (see p161) towns. Its clusters of 17th- and 18th-century whitewashed churches, built by local merchants, and its streets of low, wooden houses with traditional carved eaves and windows mean that it is also one of the most attractive towns in the area.

The first records of Suzdal date from 1024. Shortly afterwards the founder of Moscow, Prince Yuriy Dolgorukiy (see p17), built the town's kremlin on a grassy rampart above the river. Its dominant building is the Cathedral of the Nativity with its blue, star-spangled domes. Although it was built in the 13th century, most of the current building dates from the 16th century. The south and west doors are of gilded copper, etched with biblical scenes. Frescoes dating from the 13th to the 17th centuries cover the interior walls.

The Cathedral of the Nativity, in the grounds of Suzdal's kremlin

Next to it stands the former archbishop's palace, now the Suzdal Museum. Its collection of icons and ancient art is housed in the main room, the magnificent Chamber of the Cross, one of the largest unsupported vaults in Russia. To the northeast, on Suzdal's main street, a long, arcaded building dating from 1806–11 was the former merchants' quarters.

Suzdal also contains five important religious foundations, including the Monastery of St Euthymius. Once the richest in the area, with more than 10,000 serfs at its disposal, the monastery has a commanding position in the north of Suzdal, overlooking the town. Its fortified walls are almost 6 m (20 ft) thick. The monks' cells now house the Museum of Arts and Crafts, which has an impressive collection, including religious paintings and jewellery.

To the south of the monastery is the Aleksandrovskiy Convent. It was originally founded in 1240, but it burned down and was rebuilt in the 17th century.

Its Cathedral of the Ascension was built at this time by Nataliya Naryshkina, mother of Peter the Great. Rising from the meadows directly across the river here is the Convent of the Intercession. Founded in the 14th century, it was completed in the reign of Basil III in 1510–14. Its retreat houses offer overnight lodgings.

On the southwest edge of town is the Suzdal Museum of Wooden Architecture an open-air exhibition of wooden buildings brought from all over Russia. Particularly impressive is the Church of the Transfiguration, built in 1756. With domes made with overlapping shingles, it was built without using any metal nails.

Founded on the Klyazma river by Prince Vladimir Monomakh (see p161) in the late 11th century, Vladimir really began to flourish during the rule of his son, Prince Yuriy Dolgorukiy (see p17). In 1157 Dolgorukiy's heir, Prince Andrey Bogolyubskiy, brought his court here and made it the capital of the new principality of Vladimir-Suzdal. The town's heyday was in the 12th and early 13th centuries and most of the architectural monuments worth seeing date from this period. Like Suzdal, Vladimir was later eclipsed by Moscow in political importance, but it remained a significant trading centre. Today, Vladimir looks like any industrial city of the Soviet era, although, fortunately, the chemical plants and tyre factories are situated at some distance from the picturesque old part of the town, with its fine views.

When approaching Vladimir by the Moscow road, the visitor will still enter the city through the splendid Golden Gate. This was constructed in 1164, and combines the functions of both triumphal arch and defensive bastion. The icons above the archway were whitewashed by the Communists and have only recently been restored. The gate now contains a small exhibition on military history.

A short stroll down the main street takes the visitor past the 19th-century trading arcades and shops to the Cathedral of the Assumption, Vladimir's most famous monument. Built in 1158–60, high above the banks of the Klyazma, it was originally decorated with prodigious quantities of gold and silver, precious gems, majolica tiles and white stone carvings. Craftsmen came from all over Russia, Poland and the Holy Roman Empire to contribute to what was then the tallest building in Russia. The coronation of many of Russia's princes, including Dmitriy Donskoy (see p18) and Aleksandr Nevskiy (see p17), took place here.

The cathedral was damaged by fire in 1185, and when it was repaired, four domes were added. When, in the 15th century, Ivan III wanted to build the Cathedral of the Assumption in Moscow (see pp58–9), he instructed his Italian architect, Aristotele Fioravanti, to use the cathedral of the same name in Vladimir as his model.

The famous Icon of the Virgin of Vladimir (see p61) used to hang in the cathedral, but it is now in the Tretyakov Gallery (see p121). However, some superb frescoes by medieval masters Andrey Rublev and Daniil Cherny are still visible under the choir's gallery on the west wall. A short distance away is the Cathedral of St Dmitriy, built in 1194–7 by Prince Vsevolod III. A single-domed church of white limestone, its exterior is covered with more than a thousand bas-reliefs featuring griffons, centaurs, prancing lions and fantastic birds and plants, as well as a portrait of Vsevolod and his family. Over the window on the south wall is a carving of Alexander the Great ascending to heaven, a symbol of princely authority.

WHERE TO STAY

The hotel situation in Moscow has improved considerably since Russia became an independent state in 1992. New hotels have been built and grand old residences renovated. These works are likely to continue as Yuriy Luzhkov, the city's dynamic mayor, has made new accommodation a priority. Despite the improvements, there is still a great shortage of hotels of all types in the city. Worse still, as with much in modern Russian life, expansion tends to have taken place at the top end of the market and there is a shortage in the mid-price range. The selection of hotels on pages 174-7 is divided into central or further afield locations and arranged in price order. Prices are liable to rapid change so should always be checked. There are websites that act as accommodation agencies and it is possible to make a reservation at most hotels directly by phone or fax. The best method, however, is to book through a travel agent in advance.

TYPES OF HOTEL

In theory there are more than 200 hotels in Moscow. Many of these, however, are little more than hostels for professional delegations, with names such as The Oncological Research Centre Hotel. With occasional exceptions, therefore, the foreign visitor is in effect confined to hotels that fall into three broad categories: luxury hotels, the newer, mid-price hotels and the cheaper, plainer ex-Soviet hotels, which were formerly run by the state.

Luxury hotels are often foreign-owned or run as joint Russian-Western ventures. Many occupy historic buildings (some pre- and some post-Revolution), and have rooms combining period furniture with modern facilities. Service is similar to that in the best hotels in the West, but a double room rarely costs less than the equivalent of $200 a night. Hotels of this type are often referred to as Western-style.

There is comparatively little available in the mid-price range. For example, the Hotel Moskva (www.hotel-moskva.ru), which was demolished recently, used to be a valuable landmark overlooking Red Square and represented excellent value for money. Legend has it that when Stalin was presented with the two possible designs for the hotel, he unwittingly approved them both. The hotel was built with an amalgamation of both styles, as no-one on Stalin's staff wanted to point out his mistake. The Moskva is currently being rebuilt, but when it re-opens, probably in 2007, it will be as a five-star luxury hotel.

A number of smaller, more modern hotels are gradually emerging to accommodate the mid-price bracket and these are being supplemented by the redevelopment and reinvention of a number of other prominent ex-Soviet hotels. The iconic Hotel Ukraine (www.hotel-ukrainia.ru) (see p173) is currently closed for redevelopment and will reopen as a top-end hotel. The Leningradskaya (see p175) will reopen after extensive refurbishment in late 2006, as a Western-standard three-star hotel.

Of the remaining ex-Soviet hotels, those that have not been redeveloped are generally lacklustre and the service can seem to take little account of what guests actually want. Nevertheless, the rooms are usually clean and of a good size. These hotels can also offer a fascinating insight into how the elite in the Soviet era used to live. It is planned that service will be standardized with the advent of a common system of hotel accreditation.

LOCATION OF HOTELS

Most of the luxury hotels are within 15 minutes' drive or metro ride of the centre, while ex-Soviet hotels tend to be a little further out. Unfortunately, there are few moderately priced hotels right in the city centre.

For all types of hotel, the price is unlikely to be affected very much by location.

However, when choosing a hotel, visitors should think about how they want to get around the city and take into consideration whether or not they will have a car, whether they want to get to the main sights on foot, or if their ability to read Cyrillic script is adequate to allow them to use buses and the metro with confidence.

MAKING A RESERVATION

During the Soviet era all accommodation had to be arranged before going to Russia. To obtain a tourist visa, you must still pre-book a room (see p208). However, once in Moscow, it is possible to walk into any hotel and book a room on the spot. In practice, though, it is best to make arrangements before arriving. Many of the more expensive hotels may be booked up well in advance, particularly in the event of a major exhibition, which might make reservations for a full week problematic. In ex-Soviet hotels, there might be difficulties for foreign visitors arriving unannounced. Almost all the hotels listed here will accept reservations by fax or phone (many will not accept reservations by e-mail). All the luxury hotels have staff who speak good English, but it is advisable to book rooms at ex-Soviet hotels by fax, asking for written confirmation. Luxury hotels will usually ask for a credit card number as a deposit.

FACILITIES

All luxury hotels provide the facilities that would be found in an expensive hotel in the West. These include television (often satellite), business facilities, such as a message-taking service and meeting room, mini-bars, a laundry service and 24-hour room service. All rooms have a bathroom with a bath or shower, or both. Fitness facilities and swimming pools are increasingly widespread, although they are not necessarily up to Western standards in cheaper establishments. Not all hotels have air conditioning, which can be a drawback in summer.

Rooms in an ex-Soviet hotel always contain a television, a fridge and a telephone. International calls from rooms are expensive and may not be easy to make if they have to be booked through the operator. En-suite bathrooms with a bath or shower are also standard. Ex-Soviet hotels, particularly the cheaper places, are not likely to have sophisticated room service, although a laundry service can usually be arranged.

Many ex-Soviet hotels still have a dezhurnaya (conciierge) sitting at a desk on each floor. As one of their duties, these sometimes rather fearsome women look after guests' keys while they are out. Visitors should make sure they do not lose the card given to them when the keys are handed in, as it sometimes has to be shown to get back in through the main entrance. Friendly relations with the dezhurnaya will increase the chances of receiving good service or obtaining food and drink at unusual hours.

All hotels have bars and restaurants. The luxury hotels contain some of the city's finest restaurants, but do not expect to find a bargain here. Ex-Soviet hotels tend to be less flexible about meal times, and the food is much less exciting. Continental breakfasts are the norm in luxury hotels. In ex-Soviet establishments guests usually help themselves from a large buffet which includes eggs, butterbrod (sandwiches), salads and confectionary. Breakfast is not usually included in the room service and is typically only available between 7am and 8am.

The Sovietskiy's elegant Yar restaurant, where mirrored walls add to the feeling of spaciousness (see p175)

PAYMENT

The general shortage of accommodation in Moscow means that, almost without exception, hotel rooms in the city are over-priced. The rates given in this book are the standard rates quoted by the hotels. However, very few guests actually pay the full rate. Business guests usually have cheaper rates negotiated at the expensive hotels by their companies and most tourists book through an agent, again at more favourable rates. It is worth remembering that it is rarely economical to book any hotel room personally. Travellers interested in a particular hotel should ask a travel agent to enquire about special rates, or find an agent that has already dealt with the hotel. Leisure weekend discounts are available at many luxury hotels, since most of their clients are business people who stay only during the week.

Luxury hotels generally quote prices in a foreign currency (usually US dollars). However, it is illegal to pay in any currency other than roubles. The easiest way to pay in these hotels is undoubtedly with a credit card, which eliminates the need to carry around large amounts of money. Check in advance before trying to pay by travellers' cheques as luxury hotels may have a hidden surcharge. Ex-Soviet hotels do not normally quote prices in dollars and most take only cash (in roubles). Some will take credit cards, though none accept travellers' cheques.

Luxury hotels frequently quote prices exclusive of VAT and city tax; this can add more than 30 per cent to the bill. Visitors should also note that tax rates in Russia are liable to change at short notice.

Breakfast is rarely included in room prices and can be a significant addition to the bill. The cost of making phone calls (international or local) from a hotel room can be high. The local phone network (see p214) is cheaper.

Stylish and modern, the bar area of the Palace Hotel (see p176)

TRAVELLING WITH CHILDREN

Russians idolize their children, but this rarely seems to translate into hotel facilities for families. In most hotels it should be possible to have an extra bed put in a room for an additional fee, and most luxury hotels will provide babysitters. Generally, however, hotels are more interested in business guests or tour groups, so do not expect to find extensive facilities for children or favourable room rates for families.

The Marco Polo Presnya, centrally located in a quiet street (see p174)

DISABLED TRAVELLERS

Few hotels in Moscow have wheelchair access, and those that do generally have few facilities. Disabled travellers should check in advance with their travel agents or the hotels, making sure to enquire about any specific needs.

SECURITY

While many of the dangers of life in Moscow are exaggerated, hotels (particularly those owned by foreign companies) take security very seriously. Do not be surprised to see security staff with walkie-talkies patrolling the entrances of even the most refined establishments. Luxury hotels all have safe-deposit boxes and hotel guests generally have few problems with personal safety.

Ex-Soviet hotels also have a very good record on security. Porters keep undesirables out, and the dezburnaya (see p171) on each floor keeps a close eye on her own patch.

However, as in other cities, tourists are often targets for petty criminals. Take particular care when leaving the hotel, as pickpockets are known to hang around outside tourist hotels.

STAYING WITH FAMILIES

For a revealing insight into Russian culture, staying with a family can be a worthwhile option, especially for visitors who plan to stay for a month or more. The system is similar to the European bed and breakfast and prices generally include breakfast only (meals other than breakfast can occasionally be provided at a cost). Your hosts are likely to be extremely hospitable, and will probably be keen to talk about life in Russia.

Moscow Bed and Breakfast and Interchange have a range of options for staying with a Russian family.

BUDGET ACCOMMODATION

Options for travellers on a tight budget are very limited. Some of the cheaper ex-Soviet hotels have rooms for the equivalent of less than $100. The service may be rather sullen and the rooms a little shabby, but they should be clean. Their restaurants may be uninspiring at best.

Bed and Breakfast rents out apartments with cleaning included, most of them close to Belorusskaya metro. Flats for one person cost the equivalent of about $50 a night; the rate decreases for people sharing.

There are a very limited number of hostels in Moscow. Places such as Godzillas, Traveller's Guest House and Sherstone are of a good standard and specifically cater for travellers on a tight budget. They offer dormitory accommodation for the equivalent of $20, $35 and $40 a night respectively. The service is friendly and the dormitories are clean.

Outdoor café in Tverskaya, a good place to watch the world go by though good imported wine tends to be quite expensive. It is a shame to visit Moscow without sampling a bottle of Georgian wine (see p183) in one of its many Georgian eateries. This is an excellent accompaniment to Georgian food, although it can sometimes overpower the subtler flavours of European cuisine.

PAYMENT AND TIPPING

One of the drawbacks of eating out in Moscow is that some restaurants, usually the less touristy ones, only take cash. This situation is gradually changing, but it is still a consideration when deciding where to eat. Generally restaurants that serve Western or Asian cuisine will accept credit cards, but it is a good idea to call ahead and check exactly which cards are accepted and whether a surcharge is taken. Prices vary enormously from the cheapest local cafeteria (stolovaya), where a meal might cost the equivalent of around US$5, to the Central House of Writers, where dinner will be over US$75.

Tipping is not as ingrained in Russia as elsewhere. Keeping to international standards of 10–15 per cent if you are satisfied is appropriate, although regardless of the total spent in a restaurant it is unnecessary to leave more than a few hundred roubles. In Russian-style restaurants or cafés it is acceptable to leave small change, or nothing at all. Service is rarely included in the bill.

OPENING TIMES

Dinner is the main meal of the day, but many restaurants in Moscow have now adopted the concept of the business lunch. These often take the form of a fixed price menu and can be excellent value. They are usually served from noon to 4pm. Most restaurants start serving dinner at around 6pm and stop taking orders at 10:30pm; some family-run Georgian establishments close their kitchens as early as 9pm. Increasingly, restaurants are staying open until the early hours of the morning, and some are even open around the clock.

MAKING A RESERVATION

Most international and tourist-oriented restaurants take reservations and some of the most popular require them. Generally, it is best to book ahead whenever possible. However, some of the most popular Georgian and Caucasian restaurants do not take reservations and these can be busy, especially at weekends.

ETIQUETTE

Casual or semi-formal dress is acceptable in almost every Moscow restaurant. Russians tend to overdress rather than underdress, however, so it is probably safer to err on the formal side. Children are a rare sight at expensive restaurants and most menus do not have special dishes for them. Moscow does have a few family-style restaurants, and many of the Western-owned restaurants provide children's menus.

VEGETARIANS

Much of Russian cuisine consists of meat dishes. Even salads often contain meat, so the best option for vegetarians is often a beetroot or tomato platter. Georgian cuisine, featuring numerous excellent bean and aubergine dishes, is usually a better bet. Restaurants are increasingly taking into account the demands of vegetarian visitors. European, Chinese and Japanese restaurants usually have some items suitable for vegetarians. There are a few vegetarian restaurants in the city, and the standard of these is rising.

SMOKING

There are generally areas for non-smokers in restaurants. However, smoking during meals is considered acceptable in Russia and smokers sometimes pay scant regard to non-smoking areas.

DISABLED PERSONS

Few restaurants in Moscow have facilities for disabled visitors. Some restaurants are located in basements and would therefore pose a problem. It is always best to phone in advance to check if there is full disabled access.

The Flavours of Moscow

Russia's culinary reputation centres on warming stews, full of wintery vegetables such as cabbage, beetroot and potatoes. Yet Moscow was once the capital of a vast empire stretching from Poland to the Pacific and this is reflected in the variety of food on offer in the city. Aubergines (eggplants) and tomatoes, imported from the Caucasus in the south, bring in the flavours of the Mediterranean, while spices from Central Asia lend an exotic touch. On the stalls of the city's Central Market, crayfish and caviar sit alongside honey from Siberia and melons and peaches from Georgia.

RUSSIAN COUNTRYSIDE

Many Muscovites have small country houses within easy reach of the city, and spend weekends from spring to early winter lovingly tending their immaculate vegetable gardens, or combing the countryside for wild berries and mushrooms. Much of this bountiful harvest is made into preserves and pickles. There is a refreshing soup, solianka, in which pickled cucumbers impart a delicious salty taste. Pickled mushrooms in sour cream make a regular appearance on restaurant menus, as do a variety of fresh berry juices.

In a country where food shortages are a fairly recent memory, very little is wasted. Kvas, a popular, mildly alcoholic drink is frequently made at home by fermenting stale bread with sugar and a scattering of fruit. Summer visitors should make a point of trying the delicious cold soup okrosbka, which is based on kvas.

Russia is also a land with hundreds of rivers and lakes, and has a long tradition of fish cookery. Dishes range from simple soups, such as ukha, to caviar and sturgeon, and salmon cooked in a bewildering variety of ways.

A typical spread of zakuski (cold appetizers)

LOCAL DISHES AND SPECIALITIES

Beetroot

Borscht (beetroot soup) and blinis (buttery pancakes) with caviar are perhaps two of the most famous Russian dishes – one a peasant dish which varies with the availability of ingredients and the other a staple for the week leading up to Lent, when rich food would be eaten to fatten up before the fast. Much of Russia's cuisine is designed to make use of what is readily to hand or is warming and filling. A popular main course is kulebiaka, a hearty fish pie, larded with eggs, rice, dill and onion and encased in a buttery crust. Another is beef stroganoff with its creamy mushroom sauce, created in 18th-century St Petersburg by the chef of the wealthy Stroganoff family.

Borscht Made with meat or vegetable stock, this beetroot soup is usually served with dill and soured cream.

THE CAUCASUS

The former Soviet states of the Caucasus – Georgia, Azerbaijan and Armenia – are renowned for their legendary banquets, where the tables are laden with an enormous quantity and variety of food and drink. These regions still supply Russia's cities with a tempting range of fine subtropical produce. Limes, lemons, oranges, walnuts, figs, pomegranates, peaches, beans, salty cheeses and herbs are all shipped in season to Moscow's markets and its many Georgian restaurants. The cuisine of Georgia, with its focus on freshly grilled meats, pulses, vegetables, yogurt, herbs and nut sauces – including the hallmark walnut sauce, satsivi – is famously healthy and Georgians are particularly known for their longevity.

CENTRAL ASIA

From the Central Asian republics of the old Soviet Union, which include

Freshly picked lingonberries from Russia's bumper autumn harvest

Uzbekistan, Turkmenistan and Tajikistan, come a range of culinary traditions based on the nomadic lifestyles of Russia's one-time overlords, the Mongol or Tartar Hordes. The meat of fat-tailed sheep, which thrive in the desert air, is used to make communal piles of plov (pilaf) around which guests sit, eating in the traditional manner with their hands. Served in Moscow's Uzbek restaurants, it shares the menu with delicious flat breads, spicy noodle soups, manti (tasty dumplings reminiscent of Chinese cuisine) and a variety of melons and grapes, which proliferate in the desert oases, and apricots and nuts, grown in the mountains.

ZAKUSKI

A traditional Russian meal generally begins with zakuski, a selection of cold appetizers. These may include pickled mushrooms (gribi), gherkins (ogurtsi), salted herrings (seliodka), an assortment of smoked fish, blinis topped with caviar, various vegetable pâtés (sometimes known as vegetable caviars), stuffed eggs (yaitsa farsbirovanniye), spiced feta cheese (brinza), beetroot salad (salat iz styokla) and small meat pies (pirozki), accompanied by rye bread and washed down with shots of vodka. A bowl of steaming soup often follows, before the main course reaches the table.

Kulebiaka Rich, buttery puff pastry is wrapped around a mix of fish, hard-boiled eggs, rice, onion and chopped dill.

Pelmeni These meat-stuffed dumplings may be served in a clear broth, or with tomato sauce or soured cream.

Kisel A mix of red berries is used to make this soft, fruity jelly, which is served topped with a swirl of fresh cream.

What to Drink in Moscow

A glass of flavoured vodka

Russia is renowned for vodka, which has been manufactured there since the 14th or 15th century and was possibly originally invented by Muscovite monks. Vodka produced in Moscow has always been considered to be the finest. Peter the Great (see p22) was particularly fond of pepper and anise vodkas and devised modifications to the distillation process which greatly improved the quality of the finished drink.

Tea is Russia's other national drink. Traditionally made using a samovar and served black, tea has been popular in Russia since the end of the 18th century when it began to be imported from China.

CLEAR VODKA

Russian vodka is produced from grain, usually wheat, although some rye is also used. Stolichnaya is made from wheat and rye and is slightly sweetened. Probably the best known of the Russian vodkas, its name means "from the capital city". Moskovskaya is a high-quality, slightly fizzy vodka, while Kubanskaya, originally produced by the Cossacks, is slightly bitter. The Cristall distillery in Moscow has been hailed as the finest in Russia and produces super-premium versions of several vodkas, including Stolichnaya and Moskovskaya, as well as its own vodka, Cristall. Vodka is almost always served with food in Russia, often with a traditional range of accompaniments called zakuski (see p181). These specialities are usually spicy or salty and their strong flavours complement vodka perfectly.

Kubanskaya

FLAVOURED VODKA

The practice of flavouring vodka has entirely practical origins. When vodka was first produced commercially in the Middle Ages, the techniques and equipment were so primitive that it was impossible to remove all the impurities. This left unpleasant aromas and flavours, which were disguised by adding honey together with aromatic oils and spices. As distillation techniques improved, flavoured vodkas became a speciality in their own right. Limonnaya, its taste deriving from lemon zest, is one of the most traditional, as is Pertsovka, flavoured with red chilli pepper pods. Okhotnichya (hunter's vodka) has a wider range of flavourings including juniper, ginger and cloves. Starka (old vodka) is a mixture of vodka, brandy, port and an infusion of apple and pear leaves, aged in oak barrels.

Shampanskoe

WINE

The former Soviet Union was one of the world's largest producers of wine (vino). Many of its major wine regions, however, are now within independent republics, but their vintages are still popular in Moscow. A wide range of indigenous grape varieties is cultivated in the different regions, along with many types found in other parts of the vine-growing world. Georgia and Crimea (in southeastern Ukraine) have traditionally produced the best wines. Georgian wines include those made from the rketsiteli grape, characterized by a floral aroma and subtle, fruity flavour. Moldova produces white, sparkling wines in the south and central regions, and the south is also known for its red wines. Since 1799 Moldova has also produced vast amounts of a sweet, sparkling wine called shampanskoe.

OTHER ALCOHOLIC DRINKS

Originally a by-product of wine-making, brandy (konyak) only began to be made commercially in Russia in the 19th century. Among the ex-Soviet republics, Georgia and Armenia both produce brandy. Armenian is considered the finer, with a vanilla fragrance resulting from ageing it in barrels made of 70–100-year-old oak. Although beer (pivo) is becoming more popular, it is still served in relatively few restaurants and cafés. Good Russian beers include Zhigulevskoe, Baltika, Kolos and Moskovskoe. Various imported beers are also available.

OTHER DRINKS

Made from Barley and Rye, kvas is a sweet, mildly alcoholic drink consumed by adults and children alike. Russia has a huge range of mineral waters (mineralnaya voda), including many with unusually high mineral contents. Those from the Caucasus, Siberia and Georgia are especially prized. Also available are fruit juices (sok) sweetened drinks made by boiling fruit with sugar and water (kompot). The cranberry equivalent is called mors.

TEA

Russian tea is served black with a slice of lemon and is traditionally drunk from a tall glass, called a stakan, or a cup. The tea (chay) is often sweetened with jam (varенье) instead of sugar. The boiling water for making tea traditionally comes from a samovar. The water is used to brew a pot of strong tea, from which a little is poured into the glasses. This is then diluted with more boiling water.

A glass of tea, with jam (varенье) to sweeten it

THE SAMOVAR

Traditionally made from brass or copper, samovars were once used to provide boiling water for a variety of domestic purposes.

Nowadays they are often made of stainless steel and are used for boiling water to make tea.

Occasionally eggs are put in the top of the samovar to cook in the boiling water. The word samovar comes from samo meaning "itself" and varit meaning "to boil".

The food here is cooked according to old Russian recipes found in the Historical Museum archives, such as mushrooms pickled in barrels at the bottom of a lake and kedrach (cedar nut vodka). The aristocratic tradition is evident in the glorious interior. Located just off Red Square, it is an ideal venue to sample the best of Russian cuisine.

Map 3 C5

Though more expensive than its competitors, Maharaja is a safe bet for delicious Indian food. The restaurant offers tasteful décor and a quiet, low-key atmosphere. Portions are small, but the service is attentive. The location is fairly central, although the restaurant is located in the basement of a building. Most of the waiters speak English.

Noev Kovcheg Ноев Ковчег

Malyy Ivanovskiy pereulok 9 Tel 917 0717Map 7 C1

Noev Kovcheg ("Noah's Ark") offers an extensive, authentic Armenian menu, with a detailed explanation of each dish in English. The bean stew and grilled cheese appetizers are excellent, as is the acclaimed Armenian cognac. The busy restaurant often features the unobtrusive sounds of national music and is recommended for vegetarians.

Villa Вилла

Myasnitskaya ulitsa 48 Tel 925 4715Map 3 B4

Villa has a Mediterranean menu offering fresh fish and shellfish, as well as an aquarium with live lobsters. All the seafood is flown in twice a week from France. It has over 300 varieties of wine in its cellar. Decorated in an Art Deco style, it also has a huge open fireplace and live piano and singing in the evenings.

Portofino Портофино

Ulitsa Bolshaya Lubyanka 16/4 Tel 923 0286Map 3 B4

Named after the Italian city of the same name, Portofino has an Italian chef and a Mediterranean/Italian menu specialising in mushroom recipes. It has three dining areas, each of which is individually decorated. The restaurant is well worth a visit, especially for vegetarians, who will appreciate the tasty mushroom-based meals on offer.

Ulitsa Varvarka 6 Tel 232 6215Map 7 B1

Situated close to Red Square (see p106), Secession has impeccable service and is a favourite for big occasions. The only Viennese restaurant in Moscow, the restaurant offers European and Russian fare, with an Austrian accent. The interior is a barrage of colour inspired by Gustav Klimt. Live jazz music warms up the atmosphere even more.

Nostalgie Ностальжи

Chistoprudnyy bulvar 12a Tel 916 9478Map 3 C4

Nostalgie has one of the best wine lists in Moscow, which goes well with the haute cuisine prepared by a French chef. The restaurant looks out over ponds and is far from stuffy despite its high tariff; there is a special programme for children at the weekend. Reservations are recommended.

ZAMOSKVORECHEDiscovery Дискавери

Novokuznetskaya ulitsa 24/2 Tel 953 3863Map 7 B3

Discovery is located in an old merchant's townhouse and offers a Mediterranean menu. With fireplaces and a library, it has a relaxed, if busy atmosphere, somewhat reminiscent of a clubhouse. The second floor was designed to resemble a luxury yacht. Worth checking out to see another side of Moscow's restaurant culture.

Uncle Vanya Дядя Ваня

Ulitsa Pyatniskaya 20 Tel 951 0586Map 7 B2

Uncle Vanya is a traditional Russian restaurant very close to Tretyakov Gallery (see pp118–21). In the day there is quiet background music, and in the evenings live piano concerts. The menu excels at Russian favourites. Portions are large, although it is possible to order smaller meals. The borshch is particularly tasty.

Sea Time Море Времени

Ulitsa Bolshaya Polyanka 51a Tel 953 4913Map 7 A4

This fine seafood restaurant is conveniently located for the Tretyakov Gallery (see pp 118–21). The crab is flown in from eastern Russia to produce Kamchatka Crab, one of the restaurant's highly recommended specialities. There is a 15 per cent discount from noon to 4pm, making it an ideal place for lunch. Live music in the evening.

Dorian Gray Дориан Грей

Kadashevskaya naberezhnaya 6/1 Tel 238 6401Map 7 A3

Dorian Gray is a riverside restaurant with a stunning view of the Kremlin (see pp52–67), and has a traditional and elegant Italian menu. Pay a visit for what is probably the best Tiramisu in Moscow. The excellent pasta dishes and beautiful presentation are complemented by attentive and professional service.

Suliko Сулико

Ulitsa Bolshaya Polyanka 42/2 Tel 238 2888Map 7 A4

Suliko has a large and tasty Georgian menu and an interior of mini-fountains, fake plants and figurines. There is loud evening entertainment from a Georgian choir in the main hall; ask to be seated in one of the smaller rooms if you want to avoid this. The "Green Room" has an all-you-can-eat buffet from noon to 4pm daily, wine included.

Oblovov Обломов

Monetchikovskiy pereulok 5 Tel 953 6828Map 7 B4

The first floor of Oblovov is occupied by a cheaper café "Pizhon" with an Art Deco interior, serving European cuisine. The second and third floors are the actual restaurant, and specialise in French and Russian food. The Eastern Room on the third floor has water pipes and live belly dancers.

FURTHER AFIELD

NORTH OF THE CENTRE Budvar Будва

Map 4 D4

Budvar, a Yugoslavian restaurant, is famed for its service. Diners can enjoy fresh, unpretentious and satisfying food, such as schnitzel and chorba, and can select from a good range of Yugoslavian wines. The portions are generous and prices reasonable. It can get busy, so anyone wanting a romantic setting may be disappointed.

NORTH OF THE CENTRE Bungalо Bar Бунгало Бар

Map 4 D4

Bungalo Bar offers reasonably priced Ethiopian fare and authentic décor, which includes a rhinoceros! The menu includes some great vegetarian options and spicy dishes (the menu carries spice warnings). The European dishes are best avoided. Some of the more exotic options are well worth trying. Good service.

NORTH OF THE CENTRE Kavkazskaya Plenitsa Кавказская пленница

Map 3 B1

This brightly decorated Georgian restaurant takes as its theme a popular Russian comedy show from the 1970s. In summer you can dine on the open-air terrace facing the restaurant's lovely garden. There is a good range of Georgian favourites, and children's entertainers at weekends. The service is good.

NORTH OF THE CENTRE Brassiere Pourboire Брассери Пурбуар

Map 2 D3

Brassiere Pourboire is a French-run haven of reasonably priced, good quality food and excellent service, in a city dominated by high-priced restaurants. The menu and wine lists are sparse but well thought out. The Brassiere is on a quiet side street off Mayakovskaya ploshchad, and has a relaxed ambience.

NORTH OF THE CENTRE Muscat Мускат

Map 2 E1

One of the better Arabic restaurants in Moscow, Muscat offers a tempting range of Algerian, Moroccan and Tunisian dishes with a handful of European alternatives. It is one of the few places in Moscow that serves good hummus. Located within walking distance of Novoslobodskaya Metro station on the Circle Line. Good for vegetarians.

NORTH OF THE CENTRE Tofu Тофу

Map 2 F3

A great option for vegetarians, Tofu serves a mixture of Asian cuisines, ranging from Chinese to Korean. The interior is decorated in classical Oriental style. The service is friendly, and the drinks menu includes sake and plum wine. Located off Tverskaya ulitsa, this is a good option for an evening meal after exploring the city centre.

NORTH OF THE CENTRE Yapona Mama Японa Мама

Map 3 A3

Located not far from the metro, Yapona Mama ("Japanese Mother") is a marvel of glass and exposed concrete. The two levels are supplemented by a rooftop terrace for outside dining, weather permitting. The restaurant offers good service in a stylish environment, and some of the best sushi in Moscow. A few non-Japanese dishes are also served.

NORTH OF THE CENTRE Capri Капри

Map 3 C3

Capri is a gourmet restaurant with an Italian chef and an emphasis on Italian meat and seafood dishes. It also has a sushi bar and a coffee house in the grounds. Its two main dining areas are decorated to resemble a 19th-century palazzo, with furniture in a Louis XVI style. There is live music in the evening from Tuesday to Thursday.

NORTH OF THE CENTRE Market Маркет

Map 3 A2

Boasting a chef from Shanghai, Market is an Asian seafood restaurant, with a heated veranda for outside dining. A special oyster menu is laid on for certain national holidays. Although it is located a fair distance from the centre, the restaurant is worth visiting, if only for the efficient and friendly service.

NORTH OF THE CENTRE Natura Viva Натура Вива

Map 2 E2

Natura Viva boasts organically produced fruit and meat from Australia and Argentina respectively, as well as herb teas from the mountain regions of Elbrus. The restaurant consists of three floors. The first floor is more of a café, the second a restaurant in a colonial style. The third floor resembles an attic lounge.

NORTH OF THE CENTRE Simple Pleasures Симпл Плэжерс

Ulitsa Sretenka 22/1 Tel 207 1521

Map 3 B3

Simple Pleasures has an elegant minimalist interior, including one room with an open fireplace. Its eclectic menu ranges from Mediterranean to South American, taking in French and Spanish cuisine along the way. The restaurant has a solid, if unspectacular, wine list. There is live music in the evening – usually unobtrusive blues.

NORTH OF THE CENTRE Tzimmes Цимес  *Ulitsa Novoslobodskaya 3 Tel 973 0873Map 2 E1

Tzimmes is a Jewish restaurant offering genuine homemade Jewish food. The restaurant's décor is rustic in style and harks back to village life from the early 20th century. A special winter menu includes many warming favourites. There is live Jewish music in the evening and a children's club at the weekend. Formal dress code.

NORTH OF THE CENTRE Carre Blanc Карре Бланк  *Seleznevskaya ulitsa 19/2 Tel 258 4403Map 2 F1

With an ever-evolving menu and a beautiful summer courtyard, Carre Blanc is held by some to be the best restaurant in Moscow. Certainly the best French restaurant in the city, it offers superb seafood, attentive service and a tremendous range of superb dishes. Tapas is served on Thursdays.

SOUTHWEST OF THE CENTRE Genatsvale VIP Генацвале VIP  *Ulitsa Ostozhenka 14/2 Tel 2031242Map 6 E3

A Georgian restaurant, offering delicious khachapuri (hot cheese-filled bread), lobio (beans with walnuts and spices), and other Georgian musts. The extensive wine list concentrates on Georgian vintages. The cheaper Genatsvale, at No 12/1, has an almost identical menu and a much simpler interior. The evening entertainment can be fairly loud.

SOUTHWEST OF THE CENTRE U Pirosmani У пиросмани  *Novodevichiy proezd 4 Tel 247 1926Map 5 A5

This Georgian restaurant has picturesque views of Novodevichiy Convent (see pp130–31). Meat dishes are prepared in a variety of ways including chanahi (lamb with aubergine or egg-plant, served in a clay dish) and abhazuri (meat mixed with pomegranates). Delicious vegetable starters, salads and Georgian breads.

SOUTHWEST OF THE CENTRE Traktir Khlestakov Трактир Хлестаков  *3-ya Frunzenskaya ulitsa 9/1 Tel 257 2692Map 5 C5

This theatre-like restaurant is named after a play by the Russian writer Nikolai Gogol, and features 19th-century décor, waiters attired in traditional costumes, a parrot and canaries. The menu, arranged as a five-act play, offers authentic Russian cuisine. The food, wine and service are good quality.

SOUTHWEST OF THE CENTRE Sky Lounge  *Leninskiy prospect 32a Tel 938 5775Map 6 F5

Sky Lounge is situated on the 22nd floor of the Russian Academy of Sciences, and the views from the restaurant are spectacular. The food attains equally lofty heights and is a successful mixture of Asian and European fare. At weekends the restaurant invites fashionable DJs from around the world to spin lounge music.

SOUTHWEST OF THE CENTRE Vanil Ваниль  *Ulitsa Ostozhenka 1/9 Tel 202 3341Map 6 E2

Vanil offers a fusion of French and Japanese cuisine in an elegant and modern interior and includes some excellent dishes prepared from the finest ingredients. The service is discreet and thoughtful and the wine list is very good. The restaurant features a gorgeous summer veranda with beautiful views of the Cathedral of the Saviour (see p140).

WEST OF THE CENTRE Dolf Долф  *I-yy Smolenskiy pereulok 3/2 Tel 241 6217Map 5 C2

Located in a small side street just off Smolenskaya ploshchad, this is an elegant restaurant featuring a European menu that leans heavily towards Italian staples, with a well-chosen selection of French and Italian wines. The interior is calm and elegant. One room is decorated with photos featuring scenes from famous Russian ballets.

WEST OF THE CENTRE Ermak Ермак  Nizhniye Mnevnik ulitsa 41 Tel 191 2523

Rustic décor gives Ermak the feel of a 15th-century Russian cottage. Guests can enjoy such rare delicacies as Siberian river fish. The restaurant is "child-friendly", with a special children's menu and live entertainment at the weekend. There are live performances of Russian folk music at the weekends.

WEST OF THE CENTRE China Garden Китайский Сад  *Krasnopresnenskaya naberezhnaya 12 Tel 976 0586Map 1 B5

Located on the ground floor of Moscow's World Trade Centre, China Garden was one of the very first privately owned Chinese restaurants in the city and serves Szechwan, Peking and Cantonese dishes. The service is very good and friendly, and the majority of the staff speak English. A good place for a peaceful meal.

WEST OF THE CENTRE Izola Изола  *Naberezhnaya Tarasa Shevchenko 23a Tel 730 4400Map 5A1

A Mediterranean-cum-Italian restaurant with Spanish and Chilean wines. Some way from the centre, but close to the homes of the Moscow elite, it is a good place for people-watching and affords excellent views of the Moskva river. The interior is wonderful, with stained glassed windows and handmade mosaics.

WEST OF THE CENTRE Shinok Шинок  *Ulitsa 1905 Goda 2 Tel 255 0888Map 1 A3

Decorated in the style of a Ukrainian peasant house, this rustically-themed restaurant comes complete with farm animals and traditionally dressed waitresses. A shop, called "Grandmother's Chest", is part of the package and sells antique kitchenware. The Ukrainian food is expensive but delicious, and the service reasonable.

Light Meals and Snacks

Moscow has plenty of cafés, bistros, restaurants, bars and fast-food outlets catering for every taste and budget. Russian food, particularly its traditional soups and salads, is perfect for a light meal. A tempting variety of patisserie-style confectionery is also a feature of Russian cuisine, and afternoon tea can be a real occasion, especially in traditional Russian and Central Asian cafés. Pizza, pasta and sushi are in plentiful supply in a wide variety of environments, from bars and cafés to up-market restaurants. Many restaurants offer a good value "business lunch" or discount on their à la carte menu between 12pm and 4pm. For a quick bite, snacks such as pancakes and baked potatoes can be obtained from street vendors. The best stalls can be found in Moscow's busiest shopping streets, such as Tverskaya ulitsa and the Novyy Arbat.

RUSSIAN

Traditional Russian cafés and bistros are usually rustically decorated, but can be rather smoky. The menu consists of soups such as borscht, and hearty salads including silodka pod shuboi (pickled herring with shredded beetroot). Pirozhki, pastries stuffed with anything from cabbage to liver (see p181), are good fillers. Excellent examples of such offerings can be ordered at Elki-Palki and Café Margarita, while Maki Café and Art Club Nostalgie offer both European and Russian food. For a quick meal, the chain restaurants Moo Moo and Russkoe Bistro serve fast food, Russian style. For Russian food on the move the best option are the blini stalls, which can be found all over the city serving buck-wheat pancakes with a variety of sweet and savoury fillings.

GEORGIAN, ARMENIAN, UZBEK AND VEGETARIAN

Moscow's ethnic restaurants often have striking Central Asian décor. Guests may well find themselves sitting on cushions at low tables. The food tends to be simple, well-cooked and reasonably priced. Staples from the former Soviet republics of Georgia, Armenia and Uzbekistan, such as dolmas (meat and rice wrapped in vine leaves), shashlyk (shish kebabs) and lobio (a thick spicy bean soup), are well worth trying. Meals usually involve a soup, grilled meats and a fresh salad. Of the Uzbek restaurants, Kish Mish and Khodzha Nasreddin v Khive offer good value, tasty food. Shesh Besh serves generous portions of Azeri food, while Genatsvale has a superb range of Georgian favourites. Korchma Taras Bulba is an excellent place to sample Ukrainian cooking.

While vegetarians will find they are better provided for at ethnic restaurants than at Russian eateries, they may still find their options are limited. Jagannat is a wholly vegetarian restaurant, serving Indian, Japanese and Chinese meals.

FAST FOOD, PIZZA AND PASTA

Restaurant chains tend to predominate for pizza, pasta and fast food. Il Patio serves tasty pizzas at a range of locations, while Propaganda has pasta and salad dishes. For American food, Starlight Diner and the American Bar and Grill both offer authentic burgers. Branches of Rosticks, a fried chicken chain, can be found in most shopping centres. Stalls selling warming baked potatoes with a variety of toppings are dotted around the city.

PASTRIES AND SWEETS

Russian restaurants and cafés usually have a good range of pastries and sweets, the best of which feature meringue and fruit. European style cafés such as Coffee House, Zen Coffee and Shokoladnitsa have more international offerings. Russian ice cream is sold in cafés and kiosks and is truly excellent. For picnic supplies, try the delicious cakes and pastries on offer from Yeliseev's Food Hall (see p89).

PUBS AND BARS

Moscow's pubs and bars offer a good range of light meals. So-called art cafés, often featuring live music (see p201), also have excellent menus. In the evening these cafés may be busy, with some form of art-happening taking centre stage, but at lunchtime they usually have a calmer atmosphere. Two good choices are Kult and Kitaiskiy Lyotchik Djao Da, which both serve good-value, bistro-style food. Durdin and Tinkoff stock their own micro-brewed beers, and have an excellent menu. These, along with The Real McCoy, offer "business lunches" for just $6. Rosie O'Grady's is Moscow's premier Irish bar and provides a range of wholesome pub food. The Albion Pub is also a good choice and benefits from a wider menu.

SUSHI

Sushi is readily available in Moscow, and can be enjoyed in Japanese restaurants, sushi bars, nightclubs and "art cafés". Despite being landlocked, the sushi on offer in the capital is generally fresh and well prepared, though it can sometimes be a little bland.

The Yakitoria chain has branches throughout the city. It has traditional Japanese décor and offers good sushi at reasonable prices. Yapona Mama is more minimalist in ambience and serves sushi along with a variety of hot dishes, including European ones. Both are reasonably priced. Some cafés and bars, such as the Maki Café and The Discreet Charm of the Bourgeoisie, offer sushi on the menu alongside Italian and French dishes.

SHOPS AND MARKETS

Russia's appetite for Western goods means that Moscow now offers most of the shopping facilities of a large, modern Western city. There are supermarkets, department stores stocking imported goods and exclusive boutiques with French and Italian designer clothes and shoes for the new rich.

Moscow's most interesting shopping districts are located within the Garden Ring. The main department stores are clustered around the city centre near Red Square, while the best souvenir and antique shops can be found along ulitsa Arbat (see pp 70-71), a charming old pedestrian street.

For the more adventurous a trip to the weekend flea market at Izmaylovo Park is a must. Here it is possible to buy everything from Russian dolls and Soviet memorabilia to handmade rugs from Central Asia and antique jewellery.

Russian doll

A display counter in the sumptuously decorated Yeliseev's Food Hall (see p194)

OPENING HOURS

Moscow's shops and businesses rarely open before 10am and often not until 11am. Most stay open until around 7pm. Many shops, especially old, state-run stores, close for an hour at lunchtime, either from 1pm to 2pm, or from 2pm to 3pm. Shops are usually open all day on Saturdays, and nowadays many are also open on Sundays, although often for shorter hours.

Markets generally operate from 10am to 4pm but it is necessary to go in the morning to get the best choice of goods.

HOW TO PAY

Until recently many food shops, department stores and state-run souvenir (berezka) shops used the kassa system of payment. This involved visiting several cashier's desks and could be confusing for the uninitiated.

Nowadays, the kassa system is pretty rare in Moscow and there are hundreds of Western-type shops of all sizes. Throughout the city there are several chain stores, for example, Sedmoi Kontinent, Kopeika, Perekrstok and Ramstor. The latter offers a huge range of products from food to clothes.

There are also a few hypermarkets.

The only legal currency in Russia is the rouble and most shops will not accept other currencies. Vendors at the tourist markets may quote prices in US dollars. However, this will not guarantee a discount and visitors should bear in mind that it is illegal. Now that the rampant inflation of the early 1990s is under control there should rarely be pressure to pay in hard currency.

Western-style supermarkets and shops, as well as some up-market Russian boutiques, accept the main credit cards.

A new Western boutique in Moscow's largest department store, GUM

Some shops still display prices in US dollars or, very occasionally, in units that have a fixed rate of exchange with roubles. If so the price will be converted into roubles, at a higher than average exchange rate, before payment is made. Paying by credit card avoids this as credit card slips are nearly always made out in US dollars.

Prices for most goods include 15 per cent VAT. Only staples such as locally produced milk and bread are exempt.

There are a few duty-free shops in the centre of Moscow and at Sheremetevo 2 airport.

DEPARTMENT STORES

The most famous department store in Russia is the State Department Store, known by its acronym, GUM (see p107). Its beautiful edifice houses three arcades of shops under a glass roof. It was built at the end of the 19th century, just before the Revolution put an end to such luxurious capitalism. During Soviet times GUM stocked the same goods as other department stores in the city and was very dingy and run-down. It has recently been renovated and now houses several top Western chains, as well as speciality shops and boutiques. Items such as cosmetics, medicines, cameras and electronic goods are all available along with clothes and household goods.

Moscow's other large department store is TsUM, the Central Department Store. Formerly cheaper and a little shabbier than GUM, it has now been thoroughly renovated and is too expensive for most ordinary Muscovites.

Detskii Mir (Children's World) is the largest children's store in Russia. It stocks toys made in Russia, model kits and sporting equipment as well as a wide range of imported toys. In the Soviet era the cavernous halls were often almost empty. Now the colourful displays of toys reflect the new affluence of Muscovites and there is even a luxury car showroom for the grown-ups.

BAZAARS AND MARKETS

Many Muscovites buy their cheese, meat, and fresh fruit and vegetables at one of a number of big produce markets dotted around the city. One of the biggest and most picturesque food markets is the Danilovskiy Market, which takes its name from the nearby Danilovskiy Monastery (see pp136–7). The market at Metro Universitet has a wide variety of fresh produce; there is sometimes a market across the road (by the circus) in which vendors from far flung Russian regions sell produce and souvenirs. Down the road is the larger Cherkizovskiy Market which sells everything from produce to clothing. Also well worth a visit is the colourful Basmanny Market, which is in the heart of the former Nemsckaya Sloboda (German Settlement).

Izmaylovo Market is a flea market held every weekend at Izmaylovo Park (see p141). It is a treasure trove of old and new. All the usual souvenirs are on sale, including Soviet memorabilia and painted Russian matryoshka dolls (see p196), as well as antique silver and jewellery, icons, samovars, china and glassware, fur hats, amber and some of the best Central Asian rugs in Russia. In recent years many local artists and crafts people have also set up their stalls here.

Gorbushka, an indoor market, sells a variety of electrical goods, along with DVDs and CDs.

MUSEUM SHOPS

There is a small, but excellent, souvenir shop at the Museum of Modern History. Its stock includes old Soviet posters, stamps and badges, amber and lacquer boxes. Both the Pushkin Museum of Fine Art (see pp78–81) and the Tretyakov Gallery (see pp118–121) sell a good selection of art books with English commentaries.

BARGAINING ETIQUETTE

Many market vendors come from long-established trading families and expect buyers to haggle. It may seem a daunting prospect, but bargaining down the price of an item can be extremely satisfying, although visitors are unlikely to get the better of these adept salesmen. Most vendors at souvenir markets speak enough English to bargain. Little, if any, English will be spoken at other markets, so a few Russian words will certainly come in handy.

Occasionally sales people will refuse to drop their price. Try thanking them and turning to leave, to see if they will cut the price further. Their final price, whether bargained down or not, is usually reasonable by Western standards.

BUYING ANTIQUES

It is very difficult to take any items made before 1945 out of Russia (see p200). All outgoing luggage is x-rayed by customs officials to check for precious metals, works of art, rugs and icons, and complete documentation for all these objects is required before they can be exported. Permission to export antiques and art can only be obtained from the Ministry of Culture. This process takes at least two weeks and an export tax of 50 per cent of the ministry's assessment of the antiques' value will have to be paid.

It is safest to restrict purchases to items less than 50 years old. However, customs inspectors at the airport may still want to see receipts and documentation that proves the age of the objects.

Where to Shop in Moscow

The days of Soviet era queues and shortages are long gone. Moscow is a modern city, full of shops, and just about everything that is available in the West is available here. The Arbat and Tverskaya are the main shopping drags, and are filled with shoppers visiting chic boutiques and other meccas of consumerism. However, high import duties, transportation costs and the relative lack of competition can make some consumer goods more expensive than in the West. The colourful Russian arts and crafts available at many locations throughout the city are popular with visitors as are exotic goods from the ex-Soviet Republics of Central Asia and memorabilia from the Soviet era.

VODKA AND CAVIAR

Russia is the best place in the world to buy vodka and caviar, but buyers must be careful. Caviar should not be bought in the street and it is advisable to buy it in tins rather than jars. Even tins should be kept refrigerated at all times. Caviar is available from most supermarkets but, for a real Russian shopping experience, go to the slightly run-down Yeliseev's Food Hall (see p89). A pre-Revolutionary delicatessen, it was known as Gastronom No. 1 in Soviet times, and boasts chandeliers and stained-glass windows.

There is a great deal of bootleg vodka about, which can be highly poisonous. It is essential to ensure that there is a pink tax label stuck over the top of any bottle of vodka and none should ever be bought on the street. Popular vodkas such as Stolichnaya and Moskovskaya (see p182) are available from most supermarkets including Sedmoi Kontinent.

Vodka and caviar are also available at the duty-free shops at the airports (see p216), but are much cheaper in town.

Russians never mix vodka, but instead eat snacks or drink juice immediately after a 'shot', to cool the aftertaste and increase endurance.

ARTS AND CRAFTS

Low labour costs mean that handmade goods are generally cheaper here than in the West and they make exotic and interesting souvenirs to take home. The best places to buy are the markets, such as the Izmaylovo Market (see p193), and souvenir shops on ulitsa Arbat (see pp70-71). Lacquer trays and bowls, painted china and matryosbka dolls can be bought at Arbatskaya Lavitsa. Handmade lace and embroidery are on sale in Russkaya Vyshivka, while for Russian jewellery and amber visitors should try Samotsvety.

A good range of arts and crafts is also available at shops elsewhere in the city, such as Russkiy Uzory. Russkaya Galereia has an exhibition of paintings for sale, as well as jewellery and lacquer boxes. For more unusual souvenirs, try Dom Farfora, which sells hand-painted tea sets and Russian crystal, and the Salon of the Moscow Cultural Fund, which has samovars, old lamps and some whimsical sculptures and mobiles.

ANTIQUES

The new Russian rich are hungry for antiques and dealers know the value of goods, so the bargains of a few years ago are no longer available. It is also worth noting that exporting objects made before 1945 from Russia involves a lot of expense and effort (see p193). However, it is still well worth exploring the many wonderful shops full of treasures.

Ulitsa Arbat has many of the best antique shops in Moscow. Serebryaniy Ryad offers a good selection of icons, silver, jewellery and china, while Ivantsarevich has a variety of interesting Soviet porcelain.

For larger pieces and furniture visitors should go to the Aleksandr Art Gallery, and Rokoko which sells goods for people for a commission. The Foreign Book Store, which is principally a bookshop, also sells furniture and a lot of china, lamps and bric-a-brac.

FASHION AND ACCESSORIES

There are many boutiques in the centre of town around GUM (see p107), TsUM (see p192) and Okhotnyy Ryad, and along Tverskaya ulitsa (see p89). The centre also has two good arcades. Petrovskiy Passage sells clothes and shoes as well as furniture and electrical goods. Gallery Aktyor, a modern, three-storey arcade, contains Western and designer stores selling clothes, French perfumes and jewellery from Tiffany and Cartier. Clothes by Russian designers are gradually appearing in Moscow's shops.

On the edge of the city centre is the Atrium shopping centre, which contains a variety of boutiques and stores, along with cafés, bars and a cinema. On the outskirts of the city are the Mega shopping complexes at Tepley Stan and Khimki.

A wide range of authentic Russian fur hats are sold in Petrovskiy Passage and on the second floor of GUM.

BOOKS AND MUSIC

For English-language books Anglia British Bookshop, Shakespeare & Co and Dom Inostrannoi Knigi are probably the best shops to visit. The enormous Moscow House of Books sells some English-language books, and also old icons and Soviet propaganda posters. Biblio Globus is well worth having a browse in, while the Moskva Trade House deals in Russian and foreign books, as well as selling stamps, small antiques and paintings. Melodiya sells a wide range of CDs of Russian performers. For vintage and specialist music try Transylvania, just off Tverskaya ulitsa.

What to Buy in Moscow

Intricate wooden box

It is easy to find interesting and beautiful souvenirs in Moscow. Traditional crafts were encouraged by the State in the old Soviet Union, so many age-old skills were kept alive. Artisans today continue to produce items ranging from small, low-cost, enamelled badges through to more expensive hand-painted Palekh boxes, samovars and worked semi-precious stones.

Other popular items are lacquered trays and bowls, chess sets, wooden toys and matryoshka dolls. Memorabilia from the Soviet era also make good souvenirs and Russia is definitely the best place to buy the national specialities, vodka and caviar.

Samovar

Used to boil water to make tea, samovars (see p183) come in many sizes. A permit is needed to export a pre-1945 samovar.

Vodka and Caviar

An enormous variety of both clear and flavoured vodkas (such as lemon and pepper) is available (see p182). They make excellent accompaniments to black caviar (ikra) and red caviar (keta), which are often served with blini.

Flavoured vodka

Clear vodka

Malachite egg

Amber ring

Semi-precious Stones

Malachite, amber, jasper and a variety of marbles from the Ural mountains are used to make a wide range of items – everything from jewellery to chess sets and inlaid table tops.

Wooden Toys

These crudely carved wooden toys often have moving parts. They are known as bogorodskie toys and make charming gifts.

Matryoshka Dolls

These dolls fit one inside the other and come in a huge variety of styles. The traditional dolls are the prettiest, but the models painted to represent Soviet political leaders are also very popular.

Chess Sets

Chess is an extremely popular pastime in Russia. Chess sets made from all kinds of materials, including malachite, are available. This beautiful wooden set is painted in the same folkloric style as the traditional matryoshka dolls.

LACQUERED ARTIFACTS

Painted wooden or papier-mâché artifacts make popular souvenirs and are sold all over the city. The exquisite hand-painted, lacquered Palekh boxes can be very costly, but the eggs decorated with icons and the typical red, black and gold bowls are more affordable.

Palekh Box

The art of miniature painting on papier-mâché items originated in the late 18th century. Artists in the four villages of Palekh, Fedoskino, Mstera and Kholuy still produce these hand-painted marvels. The images are based on Russian fairytales and legends.

Bowl with Spoon

The brightly painted bowls and spoons usually known as "Kbokbloma" have a lacquer coating, forming a surface which is durable, but not resistant to boiling liquids.

Traditional Musical Instruments

Russian folk music uses a wide range of musical instruments. This gusli is similar to the Western psaltery, and is played by plucking the strings with both hands. Also available are the balalaika and the garmon, which resembles a concertina.

Russian Shawl

These brilliantly coloured, traditional woollen shawls are good for keeping out the cold of a Russian winter. Mass-produced polyester versions are also available, mostly in big department stores, but they will not be as warm.

Gzhel Vase

Ceramics with a distinctive blue and white pattern are produced in Gzhel, a town near Moscow. Ranging from figurines to household crockery, they are popular with Russians and visitors alike.

Soviet Memorabilia

A wide array of memorabilia from Soviet times can be bought. Old banknotes, coins, pocket watches and all sorts of Red Army kit, including belt buckles and badges, can be found, together with more recent watches with cartoons of KGB agents on their faces.

ENTERTAINMENT IN MOSCOW

Moscow offers many forms of entertainment, from great theatre productions, operas and ballets to a wide choice of lively nightlife venues. Attending a performance at the Bolshoy (see pp90–91) remains a must for opera and ballet buffs, although the main stage is closed while undergoing refurbishment. Other theatres put on an enormous range of productions, including musicals and shows for children. Moscow has several cinemas screening foreign-language films. They usually show the latest releases only a few weeks after they are premiered in the West. The city also has over 300 nightclubs and many late-night bars, some of which have live bands. In addition, there is plenty of free entertainment from street performers, especially on ulitsa Arbat (see pp70–71).

A neon sign advertising one of Moscow's casinos (see p202)

PRACTICAL INFORMATION

Moscow does not have any conventional tourist information offices. However, listings for events such as films, plays, concerts and exhibitions, together with extensive lists of restaurants and nightclubs can be found in the Friday edition of the English-language newspaper The Moscow Times. Restaurants and nightclubs are also listed in the English-language The Exile. Both are free and available at large hotels. Those who can read Russian can take advantage of the magazines Afisha and Dozug, both of which have comprehensive listings sections.

Visitors should note that the safest way to get back from late-night events is in an official taxi booked in advance (see p220).

BOOKING TICKETS

By far the easiest way to book tickets for a concert, a ballet, an opera or the theatre is through one of the main international hotels, even for visitors not staying there. Both Western-style and Russian-run hotels will usually offer this service. However, tickets bought in this way are often more expensive than those available elsewhere. Ticket-booking desks in hotels accept payment by major credit cards, but many will charge a fee for doing so. Visitors who speak Russian will be able to buy cheaper tickets from a theatre ticket kiosk (teatralnaya kassa). These kiosks are scattered all round the city and in metro stations. A particularly useful ticket agency is located on Theatre Square (see p88).

Another alternative is to book tickets at the venues. Although these tickets are usually the cheapest, it can require a lot of

THE MOSCOW STATE CIRCUS

Russians have always loved the circus. In the 18th and 19th centuries it was the most popular theatrical entertainment. Troupes travelled round the country performing mostly satirical shows. Today the renowned Moscow State Circus has its permanent home in Moscow. It is famous for its clowns, the breathtaking stunts of its acrobats and trapeze artists and its performing animals. The latter often include tigers jumping through burning hoops and bears riding bicycles, and animal-lovers should be aware that they may find some acts distressing. The original venue, now known as the Old Circus, was built in 1880 by Albert Salomonskiy for his private troupe.

Salomonskiy's Circus became the Moscow State Circus in 1919. The New Circus was built in 1973. Both venues are now in use.

The big top of the New Circus, second venue of the Moscow State Circus patience to obtain them since ticket offices are often open at unpredictable hours.

There are ticket touts outside most events, especially those at the Bolshoy Theatre. However, there is a risk that their tickets are counterfeit and they will almost certainly be overpriced.

CHILDREN'S ENTERTAINMENT

Traditional Russian entertainments for children have always included the puppet theatre, the zoo and the circus. Moscow has two puppet theatres: the Obraztsov Puppet Theatre (see p200), which puts on matinee performances for children, and the Moscow Puppet Theatre. The Nataliya Sats Children's Musical Theatre performs excellent shows, great for children of all ages.

The Russian Academic Youth Theatre (see p88) puts on a range of performances suitable for children from the age of seven.

Moscow Zoo is a great favourite but, unfortunately, the animals often look underfed and cramped in their cages.

At Arlecchino Children's Club children can play with toys and computer games or be entertained by clowns.

Miracle City at Gorky Park is an outdoor, Western-style amusement complex, which opens from late spring until late October. Children under 1.2 m (4 ft) tall are given free entry to all the children's rides, which include merry-go-rounds, trains and mini racing cars. There are also more high-octane rides, such as roller coasters.

Also in Gorky Park is the Buran Shuttle, a space shuttle that, since its one unmanned test flight, has been converted into a simulator. Would-be astronauts can also sample the tubes of foods, such as soups and pâtés, that cosmonauts typically eat.

SPECTATOR SPORTS

Traditionally, the most popular sports in Russia are football and hockey. Important matches and championships are held at the Dynamo Central House of Sports, the Krylatskoye Sports Complex and the Olympic Sports Complex. On the whole, Moscow's football grounds are safe, although hooliganism is beginning to become a problem. Krylatskoye also has a race-course and a canal where rowing races take place. The Olympic Sports Complex is Moscow's main venue for tennis tournaments.

The Arts in Moscow

From June until late September most of Moscow's concert halls and theatres close and the city's orchestras, theatre and ballet companies perform elsewhere in Russia and abroad. However, for the rest of the year the city has a rich and varied cultural scene. The Bolshoy Theatre (see pp90–91), Moscow's oldest and most famous opera and ballet house, offers an impressive repertoire. Numerous drama theatres put on a variety of plays in Russian, ranging from the conventional to the avant-garde. For non-Russian speakers there is a wide choice of events, ranging from folk dance and gypsy music to classical concerts by top international musicians. Evening performances at most venues begin at 7pm or 7:30pm, while matinées generally start around midday.

BALLET AND OPERA

There are numerous venues in Moscow where visitors can see high-quality ballet and opera. Undoubtedly the most famous is the Bolshoy Theatre, originally built in 1780. Despite two major fires, the building remains impressive and stands on its original site. Today the Bolshoy is still the best venue in Moscow in which to see opera and ballet. Its magnificent main auditorium accommodates some 2,500 people. World-famous ballets, including Giselle by Adolphe Adam and Swan Lake and The Nutcracker by Pyotr Tchaikovsky, have been danced here by the company. The theatre's operatic repertoire includes a number of works by Russian composers. Among them are Boris Godunov by Modest Mussorgsky, The Queen of Spades and Eugene Onegin by Pyotr Tchaikovsky, and Sadko by Nikolai Rimsky-Korsakov.

Another much younger company, the Kremlin Ballet Company, can be seen at the State Kremlin Palace (see p56) in the Kremlin. This gigantic steel and glass building, originally constructed in 1961 as a convention hall for the Communist Party, has a 6,000-seat auditorium. It is a prime venue for those wishing to see visiting Western opera singers, as well as for ballet.

Less grandiose, but nevertheless high-quality, operas and ballets are performed at the Helicon Opera, the Novaya Opera and the Stanislavsky and Nemirovich-Danchenko

Musical Theatre. As its name implies, the Operetta Theatre performs operettas, while the Gnesin Music Academy Opera Studio stages more experimental productions.

CLASSICAL MUSIC

Moscow has a strong tradition of classical music and has long been home to several top international music events. One of Moscow's most famous classical music venues is the Tchaikovsky Concert Hall. The main feature of this large circular auditorium is a giant pipe organ, which has 7,800 pipes and weighs approximately 20 tonnes. It was made in Czechoslovakia and was installed in 1959.

The Moscow Conservatory (see p94) is both an educational establishment and a venue for concerts of classical music. It was founded in 1866 and Pyotr Tchaikovsky (see p159), then a young composer at the beginning of his brilliant career, taught here for 12 years. Nowadays the conservatory has more than 1,000 music students at any one time.

The Bolshoy Zal (Great Hall) is used for orchestral concerts, both by the conservatory's resident orchestra and visiting orchestras. The Malyy Zal (Small Hall) is used for recitals by smaller ensembles. Over the years many prominent musicians have performed here and every four years the conservatory plays host to the prestigious Tchaikovsky International Competition (see p33).

Moscow's most prestigious classical music gathering is the annual Svyatoslav Richter December Nights Festival (see p35). Held in the Pushkin Museum of Fine Arts (see pp78–81), the concerts attract a star-studded array of Russian and foreign musicians.

In summer both indoor and outdoor concerts are held outside Moscow at Kuskovo (see pp142–3) on Tuesday and Thursday evenings.

THEATRE

Moscow has more than 60 theatres, most of which are repertory. This means that a different production is staged every night. Listings can be found in the Friday edition of The Moscow Times or in The Exile (see p215).

The Moscow Arts Theatre (see p92) stages a wide repertoire, but it is particularly famous for its productions of Anton Chekhov's plays, such as The Seagull. In contrast, the Lenkom Theatre produces musicals and plays by contemporary Russian writers. Russia's first drama theatre, the Maly Theatre, across the street from the Bolshoy, played a major role in the development of Russian theatre.

The Obraztsov Puppet Theatre (see p199) is as entertaining for adults as it is for children. It was founded in 1931 and is named after its first director, Sergey Obraztsov. The theatre's repertoire is outstanding and most of the plays can be enjoyed without a knowledge of the Russian language. Evening performances may only be open to those over the age of 18.

Performances at the Gypsy Theatre consist of traditional gypsy dancing and singing. Performances of Russian folk dancing are held at various venues throughout Moscow.

The Taganka Theatre, favourite of Russian president Vladimir Putin, has some excellent productions such as works by Mikhail Bulgakov. The Mossoviet Theatre is also among the city's best, showing alternative interpretations of Shakespeare and excellent productions of Russian classics.

FILM

The Russian film industry flourished under the Soviet regime and Lenin (see p28) himself recognized the value of films for conveying messages. Specially commissioned films shown throughout Russia on modified trains, for example, informed much of the rural population that there had been a revolution in the capital.

Until the Soviet Union's collapse in 1991, the film industry was run by the state. Films were subsidized and their subject matter closely monitored. Russian film-makers now have artistic freedom, but suffer from a shortage of funding. Cinemas show both Hollywood blockbusters and Russian releases. After a period of stagnation, Russian cinema is enjoying a real boom, and domestically produced films are now more popular than imports.

Many cinemas have out-of-date equipment, muffled sound and uncomfortable seats, but two central Russian-language cinemas, the Rossiya and the Udarnik, offer digital sound and good facilities. The Arts Cinema is one of the oldest in Moscow. Its sound system is not as good as those at the Rossiya and the Udarnik, but it remains one of the city's most popular cinemas. It shows the latest Russian releases and Western films in Russian. For English language cinema, the Dome Cinema and 35mm are the only options within the city centre. The Dome shows only one or two films a month. 35mm screens various films in English, although not very often and sometimes at peculiar times. Outside the centre Kinostar De Lux at Mega in Khimki (see p195) offers screenings in a modern Western-style cinema.

Films from Europe and India can be seen in their original languages at the Illuzion and the Cinema Centre. The latter is also the venue for the Moscow International Film Festival (see p33).

Tickets for films can only be bought at the cinemas themselves. At most, payment is in cash, although the Dome Cinema accepts credit cards.

Music and Nightlife

Under the Communist regime, Moscow's nightlife was practically non-existent and those clubs and bars that did exist were for a privileged elite. Today, nightlife in Moscow is booming. Foreign bands, DJs and performers of all types now visit the city regularly, while the quality of the domestic scene has improved markedly. The variety of venues is similarly impressive and ranges from bars where you can see local rock bands to glitzy casinos and late-night clubs playing the latest techno music. The Russian take on modern dance music is noteworthy, as Russians like to party hard and long into the night. Venues can be packed and prices high, but it is an experience not to be missed.

ROCK VENUES

After years of being isolated from major Western pop and rock acts, Muscovites can at last get to see big-name artists in the flesh. Many of the more famous acts from abroad, as well as the best in local talent, play at clubs such as Apelsin, Tochka and Sixteen Tons. Apelsin is a fairly commercial venue with its own sushi bar and bowling alley attached. Tochka caters more to the student crowd, while Sixteen Tons favours alternative and indie music.

Among the smaller venues, Bunker, Kitaiskiy Lyotchik, Djao Da, Gogol, Art Garbage and Ikra showcase less well known acts. Djao Da is good for acoustic music; Bunker, Ikra and Art Garbage are slightly larger and have a more sophisticated feel.

Major rock concerts usually take place at either Olympiiskiy Stadium or Luzhniki Stadium.

JAZZ, BLUES AND LATIN VENUES

Moscow has a vibrant jazz and blues scene, with clubs such as B2 featuring a live act most evenings. B2 is a one-stop shop for a night out and also has a pool hall, sushi bar and a disco. Other clubs worth checking out are Woodstock MKhat and Roadhouse; both put on good live music, including acts from abroad. Moscow's best club for jazz and blues is Le Club, but it's also the priciest.

Cabana, a Brazilian bar and restaurant, is a good bet for Latin American bands and hosts lively Salsa nights, as does Che. Head to Zhisn Zemelyatin Lyudi, a friendly venue, which has live swing bands several times a week.

NIGHTCLUBS AND DISCOS

The range of clubs to be found in Moscow is now on a par with other major capital cities and new clubs open every month. As elsewhere, nothing really gets going until around 11pm. Entrance is usually cheaper or free before this time although the queues can be long. Most clubs don't close until 4am; some are open until 6am at weekends.

Domestic preference is still for bass-heavy house music, with trance also becoming popular. For those who love more mainstream pop and disco, there are large clubs such as Zona offering a relaxed vibe and midweek student nights. Foreign DJs often perform at clubs such as Propaganda and Fabrique. Propaganda is one of the best known clubs, and plays a variety of styles from the latest electronic sounds to old school disco. Fabrique plays mostly house music. House music is blended with more up-tempo Latin beats at Karma Bar, while Kult offers more urban grooves, including drum & bass and four-to-the-floor techno.

A number of Moscow's leading clubs, such as Na Lesnitse, XIII, A Priori and Slava, cater to Moscow's "new-rich", with prices and cover charges to match. Slava is located away from the centre in a large complex and is worth a visit, if only to spot the partying catwalk models and Russian gangsters.

The welcoming Doug and Marty's Boar House and Papa Johns are more akin to low-key boozers than full-on nightclubs.

Keep in mind that many of Moscow's clubs have an unspoken dress code. Gone are the days when simply being Western was enough to gain entry to any club and the more upmarket venues are likely to look unfavourably on anyone wearing trainers and jeans. At some of the smaller clubs, however, such as Kult, looking too neat could also result in getting turned away by the doorman.

ART CAFÉS

Some of the city's more unusual clubs are the so-called "art cafés", such as Art Garbage or Bilingua, which promote an eclectic mix of entertainment. One night there might be live music, and the next an alternative fashion show or an avant-garde film. Vodka Bar has English-language comedy nights midweek, wonderfully kitsch décor and a great bar. The bohemian FAQ Café is a warren of cosy rooms and features concerts on weekends. Many of the art cafés are also good places to visit for a relaxed meal (see p191).

CASINOS

Moscow has some fantastic casinos. Visitors should exercise caution, however, as there are also numerous unsavoury ones, which are best avoided. New Russians love to gamble, and entrance fees and chip prices can be steep. Even if you don't intend to play, it can be entertaining to visit and soak up the atmosphere. Casinos worthy of note include Shangri La, which has excellent entertainment, New York, Jazz Town and the Udarnik Casino. None are cheap, but all are safe and foreigner-friendly.

SURVIVAL GUIDE

GETTING TO MOSCOW 216–219
GETTING AROUND MOSCOW 220–227

PRACTICAL INFORMATION

Moscow is not as difficult for visitors to find their way around as it may seem at first. Certainly, the city is vast, street names and signs are in Cyrillic, and the traffic can be formidably heavy, especially in the centre.

On the other hand, there is an excellent metro system, and passers-by and people working in hotels, restaurants and shops will usually help foreigners. However, it is a good idea for visitors to familiarize themselves with the Cyrillic alphabet in order to decipher signs.

Sign for the Intourist agency

With tourism still a fledgling industry in Moscow, some tourist facilities, such as information services, are fairly basic. The first port of call for visitors wanting information about events and practicalities should be their hotel.

Surprisingly, Moscow can be one of the most expensive cities in the world to visit. While public transport is cheap, hotels, restaurants and theatre tickets can cost more than their Western equivalents. It is always worth enquiring about the price before booking something.

Information desk run by concierge in the Baltschug Kempinski Hotel

TOURIST INFORMATION

There are no conventional tourist information offices in Moscow, so hotels are the main source of guidance for visitors. Concierges in Western-style hotels, such as the Radisson-Slavanskaya, National, Baltschug Kempinski and Metropol (see pp174-7), will provide assistance. All the large hotels, both Western-style and Russian-run, will book theatre tickets, but will add commission. Most also have a flight-booking service, accepting payment by credit card, or will put visitors in touch with a travel agency. The advice of Russian-run hotels on sights and restaurants is often indifferent, but the English-language press (see p215), particularly The Moscow Times and The Exile, has details of most exhibitions, events and opening hours.

GUIDED TOURS AND EXCURSIONS

Hotels can book places on group guided tours and day trips in several languages. Alternatively, agencies, such as Intourist in the UK, offer a wide range of themed tours, including trips around the city and special trips to more out-of-the-way places.

Patriarshiy Dom
Tours in Moscow

organizes tours in English, including trips around the KGB Museum, the Kremlin and State Armoury, as well as hiking expeditions. Tours should generally be booked at least 48 hours in advance.

ADMISSION CHARGES

Many museums and theatres charge foreigners considerably higher admission fees than Russians, although still well within European and North American norms. Those that do include the Tretyakov Gallery (see pp118-21), the State Armoury (see pp64-5), the Pushkin Museum of Fine Arts (see pp78-81) and the Bolshoy Theatre (see pp90-91). Schoolchildren and students (see p208) are entitled to discounts. Credit cards are never accepted at sights.

The ticket office, recognizable by the kassa (kassa) sign, is often some distance away from the entrance to the sight; staff at the entrance will point you in its direction.

OPENING HOURS

Most museums have standard opening hours, from 10 or 10:30am to 6pm, but ticket offices may close earlier than the museums. The majority of museums close one day a week and one day a month for cleaning. All museums open on Sundays. Some cathedrals and churches are always open, but others only open for services.

VISITING CHURCHES

Attending an Orthodox church service is a fascinating experience. The most important services take place on Saturday evenings and Sunday mornings, and on religious holidays. In general, services run for several hours. Russian churches do not have any chairs, and the congregation is expected to stand. It is acceptable for visitors to drop in on a service for a while, but certain dress rules must be observed. Shorts are not acceptable. Men must remove their hats, while women should cover their chest and shoulders and preferably wear a headscarf or hat. Although acceptable in town churches, women wearing trousers are likely to be refused entry to monasteries.

LANGUAGE

Cyrillic is the alphabet of the Russian language. It is named after Cyril (see p17), the monk who in 860–70 invented the alphabet from which it developed. Various systems for transliterating Cyrillic into Roman characters (see p252) exist, but they do not differ enough to cause confusion.

Many Russians who regularly come into contact with visitors can speak some English. However, a knowledge of even one or two words of Russian (see pp260–64) on the part of visitors will be taken as a sign of respect and much appreciated.

ETIQUETTE

Russian manners and attitudes are becoming more Westernized, but the linguistic distinction between the formal “you” (ty) and informal “you” (ty) remains strictly in force. On public transport, young men are expected to give up their seats to the elderly or families with young children.

Smoking and drinking are popular pastimes. Frequent toasts are required to justify the draining of glasses. When invited to someone’s home, the toast za khozyayku (to the hostess) or za khozyaina (to the host) should always be offered by the visitor.

Many Russians are superstitious. Most prefer not to shake hands across the threshold of a doorway and, if someone accidentally steps on a friend’s toes, the injured party pretends to step back on the perpetrator’s toes.

PAYING AND TIPPING

Roubles are the only valid currency in Russia (see p213). Some large shops and hotels may display prices in US dollars or euros, but all cash payments must be in roubles only. Credit cards are accepted in some restaurants and most hotels, but rarely in shops, except for those selling imported goods at much higher prices than abroad.

Tipping is a matter of choice, but baggage handlers at the airport and train stations may ask exorbitant sums. Visitors should simply pay what they consider to be appropriate.

ADDRESSES

Russian addresses are given in the following order: post code, city, street name, house (dom) number and, finally, apartment (kvartira) number. If a flat is part of a complex, a korpus (k) number will also be given to indicate which block it is in. When visiting a flat, it is useful to know which entrance (podezd) to the block to use.

After the Revolution of 1917, many streets were renamed to avoid imperial connotations or to commemorate new Soviet heroes. Since perestroika most streets in the centre have officially reverted to their pre-1917 names. This initially caused confusion as people would use the Soviet names, forgetting that street signs now show the original ones. However, such post-Soviet confusion is now a thing of the past.

VISAS

Visitors from almost all countries will need a visa. Only those from CIS member states (excluding the Baltic states) are exempt. All visitors travelling to Moscow should check their requirements before departing. Visa formalities are confusing. In the UK there are three types: business (for visitors who have been invited by an organization), private (for those who have been invited to stay at a private address) and tourist (for those intending to stay at a hotel or hotels).

For those on package tours tourist visas will be arranged by the tour companies. For independent travellers, the easiest way to obtain a visa is to pay a modest fee and get a specialist agent, such as Russia Direct or Visa Express, based in the UK, or Peace Travel Services in Florida, to arrange it. Moscow-based Visa House can also arrange visas for visitors of any nationality.

Alternatively, apply to the Russian embassy. Independent tourist visa applications must be supported with appropriate documentation (be sure to find out exactly what this is) as well as proof of pre-booked hotel accommodation. Holders of a private visa have to show an invitation endorsed by OIVR, the Visa and Registration Department, at their host's local police station.

Visas normally take around ten days to process but, if speed is important, both Peace Travel Services and Visa Express offer an express service for an extra fee. The cost of a visa depends on the length of its validity as well as how soon it is required.

Britons pay from about £65 for a short-term, single-entry visa issued well in advance. US subjects can expect to pay around $180.

While tourist visas cannot be extended, private and business visa extensions can be sought by the individual or organization that issued the invitation. Overstaying, however, can lead to a hefty fine or having to remain until an extension is obtained.

Igunnov House, built in 1893, now the home of the French Embassy

IMMIGRATION AND CUSTOMS

Passports and visas are thoroughly checked at immigration desks. All visitors have to fill out a customs declaration form on arrival, which is available in various languages (some airlines hand them out on the plane). On the form you are asked to state how much currency you have and any valuables you may have with you. The form is rarely checked, but should be kept for the duration of your stay and handed back together with another declaration form at departure.

It is illegal to take roubles out of Russia (nor are they allowed in). There are no limits on how much foreign hard currency may be brought in, but visitors will be expected to have less when they leave (to prove they have been buying rather than selling). Valuables such as jewellery and computers should be declared on the customs form on entry, otherwise duty may be levied on them on leaving. Departure customs are generally stricter than in other countries, particularly in regard to art and antiques (see p193).

REGISTRATION

Officially, all foreigners are supposed to register with OIVR, the Visa and Registration Department, within three days of their arrival. Hotels can do this for guests. Non-registration is rarely a problem, but sometimes people are fined or ordered to get their paperwork in order, if the authorities become suspicious of them.

EMBASSIES AND CONSULATES

Every country that has diplomatic relations with Russia has an embassy or consulate in Moscow. Anyone intending to reside in Russia for longer than three months is advised to register with their own one. Should a visitor be robbed, hospitalized, imprisoned or otherwise rendered helpless, the embassy or consular officials will then be able to help, for instance with interpretation, or at least to give advice. They can re-issue passports and, in some cases, provide emergency money.

DISABLED TRAVELLERS

Moscow has few facilities for the disabled. Public transport is difficult to access; steps and narrow doors are everywhere and lifts are rare. It is advisable to phone in advance to check if a tourist sight has full disabled access.

International Student Identity Card

STUDENT TRAVELLERS

As well as being accepted for discounts in museums, international student cards can also be used to obtain discounts on rail and air travel booked through STAR Travel.

TRAVELLING WITH CHILDREN

Russians adore children, and those accompanying visitors to Moscow are likely to attract plenty of compliments. On the other hand, it is not unknown for Russian grannies (babuski) to be overly inquisitive and even to offer critical, though well-meaning, remarks on the way they are dressed.

Children under six travel free on public transport, but older ones pay the full price. Museums are free for toddlers and babies, and offer concessions to schoolchildren.

Men's toilets

Women's toilets

Children playing on a cannon at the Armoury in the Kremlin

PUBLIC TOILETS

Few cafés and bars have facilities, and public toilets on the street are not pleasant. It is often best to find the nearest foreign hotel or a pay toilet in, say, a department store. These are usually very cheap. Though the lady who takes the money also hands out rations of toilet paper here, it is always a good idea to carry your own.

ELECTRICAL APPLIANCES

The electrical current in Russia is 220 V. Two-pin plugs are needed, but some of the old Soviet two-pin sockets do not take modern European plugs, which have thicker pins. Hotels all have modern sockets. Adaptors are best bought before travelling, but those for old-style plugs are found only in Russia. US appliances need a 220:110 current adaptor.

PHOTOGRAPHY

There are no longer any serious restrictions on what visitors are allowed to photograph (unless you want to take aerial pictures). Expect to have to pay for the right to take photos or use a video camera in museums.

TIME DIFFERENCE

Moscow time is three hours ahead of Greenwich Mean Time (GMT). Russia has recently come into line with the rest of Europe, putting its clocks forward by an hour at the end of March, and back again in October.

Personal Security and Health

Despite lurid worldwide reporting on the mafia, crime in Moscow is no worse than in any big city. Petty crime should be the visitor's only concern, but even this can usually be avoided if sensible precautions are taken. For language reasons, it is a good idea to have a card with your Russian address written on it for use in taxis and emergencies. Medical insurance is essential. Although many medicines are readily available, local healthcare compares poorly with Western care and English-speaking services and medical evacuation are very expensive.

PROTECTING YOUR PROPERTY

Every visitor should take out travel insurance. Once in Moscow, visitors can avoid pickpockets by not carrying money in open pockets or displaying large sums of money in public; bags should be kept closed and roubles kept apart from foreign currency and credit cards. It is advisable to carry a small sum of money for purchases, and to keep the rest separately or at the hotel.

It is best not to stop for gypsies who sometimes frequent Tverskaya ulitsa and the central metro stations, apparently begging. Hold tight to valuables and walk determinedly on without aggression.

Travellers' cheques have the advantage that they are insured against loss or theft. However, if they are stolen this should be reported immediately to the issuing company as they can easily be "laundered" in Russia.

It is absolutely essential to report thefts to the police in order to obtain certificates for insurance claims. It is best to report first to hotel security staff who can usually provide interpreters or deal with the whole matter. Embassies will deal with serious situations.

GAI policeman checking documents

PERSONAL SAFETY

The greatest danger for visitors comes from thieves who might become violent if they encounter resistance. As in any country, it is advisable to hand over belongings if they are demanded with menace.

The mafia, though widespread, has scant contact with foreigners, particularly tourists, who are generally much poorer than Russian businessmen.

Women on their own may be approached by kerbcrawlers, who are best ignored, and may be propositioned if alone in bars and restaurants. At night, it is safer to use taxis booked in advance rather than those hailed on the street. The metro is also safe.

Other threats come from local drivers, who see pedestrians as a nuisance, and from manhole covers, which have a tendency to rock wildly or collapse when stepped on.

POLICE

Several kinds of police operate on Moscow's streets. They change uniforms according to the weather, wearing fur hats and big coats in winter.

The normal police or militsiya, who always carry guns, are the most frequently seen.

The riot police or OMON (otryad militsii osobgo naznacheniya) are rarely seen on the streets and dress in camouflage.

Totally separate are the traffic police, or GIBDD (gosudarstvennaya inspekcia bezopasnosti dorozhno dvizheniya).

Recognizable by their striped truncheons, they may stop any vehicle to check the driver's documents.

Both the militsiya and GIBDD supplement their incomes by picking people up on minor offences, such as jay-walking. It is usually best to pay the "fine", which is about the equivalent of five or ten dollars.

PHARMACIES

Pharmacies in Russia are all signed by the word Аптека (apteka) and usually have a green cross hanging outside. The best ones are on ulitsa Novyy Arbat, Tverskaya ulitsa and Kutuzovskiy prospekt. These sell many imported medications, some with the instructions still in the original language. Prescriptions are not necessary for any purchase, and antibiotics and other strong medications can be purchased over the counter. All the assistants are trained pharmacists and can suggest a Russian alternative to visitors who name the drug they are seeking. However, visitors with specific requirements, particularly insulin, should bring enough with them for their whole stay. Moscow has a number of all-night pharmacies (see directory).

MEDICAL TREATMENT

Most hotels have their own doctor and this should be the first port of call for anyone who falls ill. There are several companies, notably the European Medical Centre and the American Medical Center, that specialize in dealing with foreigners. They can provide everything that travelers are likely to need, from basic treatment where they are staying to dental care, x-rays, ultra-sound scans and even medical evacuation home. Their charges are very high, but they are all used to dealing with foreign insurance policies.

Slightly cheaper is Assist-24, which has English-speaking Russian doctors who are well able to deal with minor medical emergencies. US Dental Care provides a full range of dental treatment.

For those in need of immediate attention, without the time to contact any of the above, the casualty department of the Botkin Hospital is the safest bet. The staff can give injections and stitches and carry out general first aid, but no English is spoken.

Anyone waking up in a local hospital should contact their embassy or one of the above medical centres. They can arrange a move or oversee care.

HEALTH PRECAUTIONS

Visitors should not drink the tap water in Moscow, but stick to bottled water and avoid fruit and raw vegetables that may have been washed in tap water. Food in a foreign country often unsettles the stomach and eating the meat and sausage pies (pirozьki) sold on the streets is a sure route to a stomach upset.

In past years diphtheria has increased among the local population. It is advisable to be inoculated against this before going to Russia.

MOSQUITOES

Mosquitoes (komari) are the bane of everyone's life between June and late September. Plug-in chemical mosquito coils are available and are particularly good at night. Alternatives are sprays, or oil repellants used in vaporizers or burnt in candle form.

In the woods or countryside, some sort of repellent is also necessary and not all of those available locally are effective. It is best to bring repellents and anti-histamine cream, for treating bites, from home.

Banking and Local Currency

Moscow is slowly moving into the credit card age and major Western cards can now be used to pay in hotels, top restaurants and some shops. Everywhere else, however, cash is the norm, and roubles are the only legal currency. The city is well provided with exchange points where visitors can turn their currency (US dollars still being the most popular), travellers' cheques or credit cards into roubles. Rates of commission vary. Since bank exchange rates are so good, money should never be changed on the street. Apparently "better" offers from private individuals will lead to visitors being cheated.

CHANGING MONEY

Roubles cannot be obtained outside Russia, but there are numerous exchange offices all over Moscow, including at the airports. Some offices are open 24 hours a day.

A passport has to be shown when changing money. Any defect on foreign bank notes, especially vertical tears or ink or water stains, makes them invalid in Russia and they will be refused at the exchange. Make sure that all notes brought into Russia are in good condition and that any US dollars were issued after 1990.

On completing a currency transaction, an exchange slip is issued. All slips should be kept as they must be attached to the customs declaration filled in on arrival in Russia (see p208) and presented at customs on leaving the country.

USING BANKS

There are only a few foreign banks in Russia and they mostly do not offer over-the-counter services. Most Russian banks, however, do have on-the-spot exchange services. They take a variety of currencies, credit cards for cash advances, and some take travellers' cheques. Alfa-Bank and Sberbank offer the best rates. For anyone wishing to have money sent to a bank in Russia, these two banks are also the most reliable. It is always advisable to check other banks' reliability.

Western Union will transfer money to Russia for you through Alfa-Bank, Gута Bank, Bank Moskvу and American Express, but they are expensive and primarily of use to businesspeople.

Many independent exchange offices in Russia accept only US dollars and euros.

CREDIT CARDS

It is now possible to obtain cash, both roubles and US dollars, with a credit card through the larger banks and from automatic cash dispensers at some banks and in major hotels. The local commission is between 2 and 5 per cent, plus whatever the card company charges. The most commonly accepted card is VISA, with Diners, MasterCard, Eurocard and American Express much less widely recognized. The cash dispensers at Alfa-Bank take MasterCard, Eurocard and VISA and charge no local commission, making them a popular option with visitors.

Lost or stolen credit cards should be reported immediately to the credit card company in the home country. No local security service is offered.

TRAVELLERS' CHEQUES

Banks charge at least 3 per cent to cash travellers' cheques. Only large banks, such as Alfa-Bank and Sberbank, offer this service. The cheapest alternative is American Express cheques, with a 2 per cent commission if cashed at the American Express office. Travellers' cheques can only be used as payment for goods or services in a few large hotels, and are acceptable only in US dollars and euros, or sometimes British pounds. In most cases euro cheques are usually preferred.

LOCAL CURRENCY

The Russian currency is the rouble (or ruble), written рубли or abbreviated to р or руб. The higher denominations of roubles are currently available in banknotes, which all bear images of well-known Russian cities, the lower denominations in coins. The kopek, of which there are 100 in a rouble, is issued in coins.

In 1998 the rouble was re-valued owing to its stronger value and lower inflation rate. Values were divided by 1,000 (with 1,000 roubles becoming 1 rouble).

Banknotes

There are five denominations of banknote, with face values of 10, 50, 100, 500 and 1,000 roubles, and they have the same designs as their pre-revaluation equivalents. When changing money check that the notes correspond to those shown here.

Coins

The revaluation of the Russian rouble in 1998 led to the revival of the long-redundant but much-loved kopek. Traditionally, the rouble had always consisted of 100 kopeks. In addition to coins for 1, 2 and 5 roubles, there are now coins valued at 1, 5, 10 and 50 kopeks. Any coins issued before 1997, prior to revaluation, are essentially valueless. Visitors should therefore always examine change they receive and refuse to accept any of these old coins.

Communications

Much of Moscow's antiquated phone system has been brought up to date in the last few years and there is now a good city-wide service. Many hotel and public phones have direct dialling all over the world, but phones in private homes may not have this facility. The same period has seen an explosive increase in the number of magazines, newspapers and television channels. Sadly, Russia's postal system has not improved at the same rate.

A sign outside a post office (pochta) that has public telephones (telefon)

TELEPHONE SERVICES

Comstar satellite phone boxes, which are blue, are installed at airports, in business centres, in most hotel foyers and in some restaurants. They accept credit cards or phonecards on sale in major hotels, restaurants and clubs, but calls are expensive. Moscow's local system is much cheaper. It is possible to call abroad on a direct line from one of the Moscow State Telephone Network (MTC) blue and white cardphones, located on streets and in some metro stations. Cards for the phones come in 25, 50, 100, 120, 200, 400 and 1,000 units, and are available from kiosks and post offices. To make an international call, at least 100 units are needed. International and inter-city calls are cheaper between 10pm and 8am and at all hours at weekends. The

Central Telegraph

Office has rows of local and international phones and calls are paid for at the counter.

At present, local calls from private phones are free, as they are covered by the cost of the line rental. This system may well change in the future, however, as there is increased pressure from the phone network to introduce a charge-by-the-minute system for calls.

Instructions on how to use an MTC cardphone are given below. Comstar phones work in the same way if used with a phonecard. The instructions automatically come up first in English. If using a credit

- 7 To end a call, replace the receiver and pull out the card.

POSTAL SERVICES

Post offices such as the Main Post Office and those in hotels sell ordinary and commemorative Russian stamps, postcards, envelopes and phonecards. The smaller post offices are marked почта (pochta), and are most plentiful in the centre of the city. They generally have big glass windows and have blue post boxes outside.

International post is often slow and is probably best avoided except for postcards. Post International, which also offers poste restante, provides the same service as courier companies. American Express runs its usual poste restante service for card holders.

Use a courier service for important documents, such as DHL Worldwide Express, Federal Express and TNT Express Worldwide. Anything other than paper, especially computer discs, is checked by customs, which can delay dispatch by an extra day or so.

FAX, TELEX, TELEGRAM, AND E-MAIL SERVICES

Many hotels and the Main Post Office offer fax, telex and telegram services. Telegrams in foreign languages can also be sent from the Central Telegraph Office. In addition to postal services, Independent Postal Service offers fax and e-mail services, while Internet cafés such as Netland and Time Online allow you to browse the Internet and send e-mails.

TELEVISION AND RADIO

Hotels have long offered Eurosport, CNN, BBC World Service TV and NBC channels. Russian-language television is dominated by Imported soap operas, which are generally dubbed into Russian rather than subtitled. The best national news in Russian is on NTV, and the best local news on TV-Tsentr. For English-language radio broadcasts the best are still the BBC World Service and the Voice of America, which are broadcast on medium and shortwave. Ekho Moskvy provides an excellent news service in Russian.

Good pop stations include Radio Maximum (103.7 FM) and Local Europe Plus (106.2 FM) both of which play Western music, and Russkoe Radio (105.7 FM) which plays Russian music. Orfey (72.14 FM) plays classical music without adverts.

NEWSPAPERS AND MAGAZINES

Moscow has one major English-language daily newspaper, The Moscow Times, published from Tuesday to Saturday. It covers both domestic and foreign news and has listings of exhibitions and events in its Friday edition. The Saturday edition has weekly television listings.

The Exile, also in English, is a satirical weekly, and has good entertainment and restaurant listings. The English language version of The Moscow News is also a weekly and has listings.

English- and Russian-language newspapers

All of these papers are free and can be found in airports, clubs, restaurants and other places where foreigners gather. There is also a Russian language version of the UK listings magazine Time Out, which has extensive listings as well as articles. It can be bought at most newsstands.

GETTING TO MOSCOW

The quickest and most comfortable way to get to Moscow is by plane. Travelling overland, especially by road, can be difficult and often involves crossing numerous borders and negotiating roadworks and pot-holed roads. However, if cost is the priority, rail or coach are possibilities, especially for visitors arriving from St Petersburg or a neighbouring country,

A plane owned by the Russian airline Aeroflot such as Ukraine or Belarus. It is essential that visitors plan their journey before applying for a visa (see p208) since the Russian authorities require detailed information about travel arrangements, including which cities visitors will use to enter and leave Russia. Whichever route is chosen, it is worth shopping around to find the best deal as prices fluctuate greatly throughout the year.

Exterior of Sheremetevo 2, Moscow's main international airport

ARRIVING BY AIR

There is a reasonable choice of flights to Moscow from the UK. Three carriers – British Airways, Aeroflot and Transaero – operate direct flights, while several other airlines, including SAS, KLM and Austrian Airlines run a variety of flights via a number of destinations. Transaero, which now flies direct from London, is the only reliable Russian alternative to Aeroflot. Both Transaero and Aeroflot operate long-haul flights from the USA, Australia and Canada. Despite popular belief that Aeroflot's flights are of an inferior quality, its Moscow to London route is a reasonable option, and its first-class service is excellent.

Cheap trips are advertised in the travel sections of many newspapers and magazines. There are also several agencies in London and New York that book trips to Russia. Some, such as Eastways Travel Service, sell only flights, while others, such as Russian National Group, also book hotel accommodation or offer inclusive package deals. These can be cheaper than booking flights and accommodation separately. Some agencies also arrange visas for travellers (see p208).

MAIN AIRPORTS

Moscow has two main air terminals, each servicing various domestic and international locations. The major international terminal for many years was Sheremetevo 2, but now many airlines have relocated to Domodedovo, the more modern international airport in the south of the city. Improvements have been promised for many years at the shabby Sheremetevo 2, but little has been done.

Sheremetevo 2 is situated about 28km (17 miles) northwest of the city centre. It has one terminal, with flights divided between its right and left wings. Central notice boards in both the departure and arrivals lounges indicate which wing each flight is expected at or leaving from.

At Domodedovo, departure and arrival times are clearly displayed on monitors near the check in desks. Visitors are required to fill in customs declarations upon departure and arrival at both airports.

Tourists can expect a long wait when arriving at Sheremetevo 2. Things are generally a lot better at Domodedovo, although at peak times there can be large queues. Exchange offices, duty free stores and the like can be found at both airports.

OTHER AIRPORTS

Moscow has three other airports. Sheremetevo 1, close to Sheremetevo 2, is used mainly for domestic flights, including those from St Petersburg. It also handles all Transaero flights and some Aeroflot charters from abroad. Flights destined for the nearer parts of Russia and other CIS member states often leave from Vnukovo airport, which is located in the southwest of Moscow. Bykovo, to the west, is Moscow's smallest airport and is used only by small, old-fashioned planes as it does not have the modern runways needed by larger aircraft. Bykovo serves the less important routes within Russia and, in summer, also receives some charter flights.

15 minutes' walk from either Aeroport or Dinamo metro stations. Another bus route runs to Rechnoy Vokzal bus station, close to Rechnoy Vokzal metro. Both services run from 6:25am to 11:30pm.

Buses and minibuses leave from Domodedovo from outside the domestic terminal, situated next to international arrivals. Bus services run from 5:45am–11:30pm. Both services go to Domodedovo metro station. There is also an hourly express train service to Paveletskiy station, from where you can easily connect with the metro system.

Sheremetevo 1 has both bus and mini-bus services, which also go to Rechnoy Vokzal bus station or the air terminal. Both services run from 6:25am until 11:30pm. The minibuses seem to also run all night, but their schedule is erratic. The destination of each bus is indicated by a sign displayed in its front window.

For those preferring to travel by taxi (see p212) there are several things to remember. Firstly, it is much easier for travellers to book a cab prior to arriving, either through a travel agency or hotel. Airport taxis are expensive (the equivalent of US$50–60 to the city centre) and not all of them are official. These unofficial drivers are generally safe, but it is better to walk outside to the rank of official taxis. These yellow cars have black chequered designs on the roof. The taxi meters installed in most of them are rarely used so it is vital to negotiate a price for the trip beforehand. No tips are necessary. The journey into the city centre should take about 30–40 minutes if the roads are clear.

GETTING INTO THE CITY

Although the easiest way of getting into the city from either Domodedovo or Sheremetevo 2 is by taxi there are other options. From Sheremetevo 2, around 7 km (4 miles) from the centre of Moscow, a bus runs from the arrivals hall to the air terminal (Aerovokzal), taking about 35 minutes. The air terminal is about

ARRIVING BY TRAIN

Moscow can be reached by train from Paris, Brussels, Berlin and several other European capitals, but the trip will take at least a day and a night. Travellers should be prepared for a lengthy wait at the Russian border while all of the train's wheels are changed to fit the wider Russian tracks.

Three of Moscow's main railway stations are situated on Komsomolskaya ploshchad (see p144), also known as

ploshchad Trekh Vokzalov (Square of the Three Railway Stations). Yaroslavskiy and Kazanskiy serve domestic routes only. Leningradskiy is the terminus for trains from St Petersburg and Finland. Of the other stations, Rizhskiy serves the Baltic and Kievskiy serves Eastern Europe, while Belorusskiy handles trains from Western Europe and Poland. Paveletskiy and Kurskiy stations are the points of arrival for trains from southern Russia and parts of the Ukraine.

Tickets for all trains have to be booked in advance. Owing to the long distances covered on many routes, the majority of trains are overnight sleepers, but there are some standard trains operating on the shorter routes. Trains fall into four categories: express (ekspresy) trains, which travel the direct route between Moscow and St Petersburg only; fast (skorye) trains, which operate on long journeys and stop at only a few stations; passenger (passazhirskie) trains, which also operate on long routes, but stop at most or all stations; and suburban (prigorodnye) trains (see p227).

ARRIVING BY COACH

It is possible to get to Moscow by coach, but it is only usually worth it if visitors are travelling from a neighbouring country or are on a tight budget. There are coach routes to Moscow from the Czech Republic, Poland, Hungary and Slovakia. Some run via the Ukraine, while others enter Russia via Belarus.

Sometimes a change of coach is necessary and the onward journey from either country takes 12–16 hours as the roads to Moscow from Belarus and the Ukraine are not well maintained.

TRAVELLING TO MOSCOW FROM ST PETERSBURG

The easiest way of getting to Moscow from St Petersburg is by train. Express trains run from Moskovskiy station in St Petersburg to Leningradskiy station in Moscow. It is easiest to organize a ticket through a hotel or travel agent.

The best night-time trains are Nos. 1 (called the Red Arrow) and 3 from St Petersburg to Moscow, and Nos. 2 and 4, from Moscow to St Petersburg.

Sign indicating the Aurora train from St Petersburg to Moscow

A ticket from a Moscow–St Petersburg express

All these services leave at midnight and arrive at 8:30 the next morning and are usually on time. Other trains, including Nos. 47 and 159 (the Aurora) are almost as good, especially for those who prefer to make the trip in the day. On all these trains travellers should be wary of thieves. Most compartments have locks, which should be used at night.

Ticket prices start at the equivalent of US$10 for a basic seat and rise to US$35 per person for a two-person compartment. Prices are usually higher for foreigners than for Russians. There is a choice between sidyashchyy (sitting) tickets and a variety of more expensive sleeper options. Bedlinen costs extra. Food may be available, but visitors are advised to bring their own.

Compartment on the Red Arrow St Petersburg–Moscow express

The alternative to taking the train is flying. The flight only takes 50 minutes, but allow plenty of time to get to and from the airports, especially in Moscow (see p217). Planes depart from Pulkovo 1 airport in St Petersburg and arrive at Sheremetevo 1 (see p216). The air fare is considerably more expensive than the train.

GETTING AROUND MOSCOW

Moscow's vast metro network, which has stops close to all the major sights, is the most reliable way of travelling around the city. However, it can get extremely crowded. Moscow is also served by buses, trolleybuses and trams. Services are relatively frequent, although delays are now more common than they were in the Soviet era. A knowledge of the Cyrillic alphabet will help with reading signs on these services. Suburban buses are particularly useful for travelling around Moscow's outlying districts, beyond the reach of the metro network, and bus routes often start at a major metro station. Trams run as far as the outskirts of the city, but services are gradually being reduced. Trolleybuses are a good means of transport in the city centre, covering the popular routes. Taxis are the most flexible, but most expensive, way of getting around.

The Kremlin, at the heart of Moscow (see pp52-67), must be explored on foot

WALKING

Moscow's centre is very spread out and so not easily negotiable on foot. However, the area within the Boulevard Ring, where many sights are located, offers a few good opportunities for walking. At the heart of the city are Red Square (see p106) and the Kremlin, which are only accessible on foot. Visitors should allow three hours to cover this area including all the cathedrals in the Kremlin.

Across the river from here, beautiful Zamoskvoreche (see pp114-25) is another district which pedestrians will enjoy.

Muscovites themselves are not great walkers but, in the evenings or at weekends, they can often be seen taking a stroll around the Old Arbat (see pp70-71), a district of the city frequented by artists, musicians and street performers. Other places to take a walk are Tverskaya ulitsa (see p89), numerous parks – in particular Gorky Park (see p129), Izmaylovo Park (see p141) and Sokolniki Park – and by the Moskva river.

When embarking on a walk around the city, it is a good idea to wear sturdy shoes, and preferably old ones as Moscow can be dirty. Traffic is heavy and major roads can often be crossed via subways (although, as in other cities, it is wise to be vigilant when doing so alone). Alternatively use a zebra crossing if a green light shows: drivers in Moscow do not stop at zebra crossings without lights. It is not advisable for anyone, but especially a woman, to walk around any part of the city alone late at night. The best walking tours in English are organized by Patriarshi Dom Tours (see p206).

TAXIS

For safety reasons it is best to travel only by official taxis: yellow cabs with a black chequered design on their roofs. They can be booked through the Moscow Taxi company, although operators are unlikely to speak English, or alternatively through a hotel. They usually arrive within half an hour. Taxis to the airport should be booked well in advance. Some hotels have their own taxi ranks, but the taxis that wait there can be very expensive. It is possible to flag down an official taxi on the street. Some switch on a green light, either on

HOT AIR BALLOONS

Taking a trip in a hot air balloon has recently become a popular pastime among well-off New Russians and visitors to the city, especially in the summer. Aygur launches its balloons near the Istra river in Zvenigorod outside Moscow. Rides last for about two hours, taking three passengers, who can include children, in addition to the pilot. Trips are expensive, but offer fantastic views of the city including the "Seven Sisters", Stalinist-Gothic skyscrapers (see p45).

Hailing a private car for a ride, a common practice among Russians their window or on their roof, to indicate they are for hire. Others do not, but if they are for hire they will stop. All official taxis have meters, but some are out-of-date and the driver may prefer to negotiate the fare. It is crucial either to agree on a fare, or to be sure that the driver turns on the meter, before setting off.

Russians themselves prefer to use private taxis (chastniki) to official ones. Any car can be hailed and a fee agreed for a journey. Other cars may therefore stop when an official taxi is hailed. Private taxis are cheap and generally safe. However, it is not advisable for visitors to the city who do not speak Russian to use them.

MOSCOW RIVER CRUISES

River boats are extremely popular in summer. They operate from May to October and cover quite a long stretch of the Moskva river. They stop at 10 or so points along the river and you can hop on and off, but must purchase a new ticket each time. All riverboats have two decks and on sunny days the upper deck is great for combining sunbathing with sightseeing.

River cruises pass several major sites and are a good way to get a feel for the city's layout. The main pick-up point for these cruises is opposite Kievskiy station. Major stops are near Moscow State University at Sparrow Hills (see p129), Gorky Park and

The Metro

Moscow metro symbol

Moscow is a sprawling, hectic city. One of its great assets, however, is its excellent metro network, which extends from the centre right out to many of its suburbs. During the rush hour, in particular, heavy traffic means that it is often faster to travel by metro than by car, let alone any other form of public transport. For years all transport in the Soviet Union was extremely cheap and metro fares are still very good value. At present passengers pay the same fare regardless of the length of their journey. However, the city authorities have announced plans to introduce new variable fares at some point in the future. The metro system is extremely reliable, with trains running frequently throughout the day. Constructed as part of Stalin's grand plan for rebuilding Moscow, it is also a tourist attraction in its own right (see pp38–41).

The ornate, cavernous interior of Arbatskaya metro

THE NETWORK

The Moscow metro network is well planned and extensive, consisting of 10 lines which cover the whole city except its outermost suburbs. One feature worth noting is the circular line connecting all the mainline railway stations (see p218). Changing between the metro and a mainline station is generally easy as both have the same name, but with a slightly different ending. Belorusskiy railway station, for instance, links to Belorusskaya metro, and Kievskiy railway station to Kievskaya metro. However, Komsomolskaya, also on the circle line, is the exception. It links to three mainline railway stations – Leningradskiy, Kazanskiy and Yaroslavskiy.

The metro lines are colour-coded and numbered from 1 to 10, and all signs are in Cyrillic only. Trains arrive frequently, generally every 1–2 minutes on weekdays, while services are slightly less frequent at weekends. During the rush hour the interval between trains is usually under a minute.

The Moscow metro is on the whole safe and reliable. All the stations are staffed, although metro attendants are unlikely to speak anything except their mother tongue. Travellers who have a heavy bag or a suitcase will have to pay an added charge.

CHANGING LINES

For those unused to the complexity of Moscow's metro system, journeys can be made even more confusing by the fact that stations where it is possible to change between metro lines often have two or more separate names, one for each line involved. On the metro map (see p224) these interchange stations are bracketed together. For instance, near the centre of the city there is an interchange between four lines – 1, 3, 4 and 9 – each of which is served by a different station. Correspondingly, four station names are given on the map: Biblioteka imeni Lenina, Arbatskaya, Aleksandrovskiy Sad and Borovitskaya.

When changing lines at an interchange station it is therefore important to know the name of the station on the other line. It is then easy to reach the right platform by following the (perekhod) – or “interchange” – signs indicating this name.

TICKETS AND TRAVEL CARDS

There is no such thing as a one-day travel card in Moscow. Instead, there are tickets for one, two, five, 10, 20 or 60 rides, or passes for three months or a year. As the fare for a single journey is still a flat rate, whether it is a couple of stops or the length of the network, it is a very simple system to use. This also means that it is possible to change as many times as necessary if exploring the metro's architectural highlights (see pp38–41). Buy enough tickets for your stay at one time to avoid waiting in the ticket counter, or каска (kassa) queues, which can be long during the morning and evening rush hours.

The usual type of ticket is a magnetic card (magnitnaya karta) which works on a phonocard principle. When a card is inserted into the barrier, the passenger is allowed through if the card is valid, and the number of journeys left will be reduced by one. This number will then flash up on the display.

There are also new 'smart cards' which work on the same principal, but rather than being inserted into the barrier, are simply swiped across a yellow detector which reads the information. Any number of people can travel on the same ticket or card since they all pay exactly the same fee for their journey.

There are no child tickets for the Moscow metro, but children under six travel free of charge. Metro ticket counters also sell phonecards and tickets for trolleybuses, buses and trams (see p225).

MAKING A JOURNEY BY METRO

1 Study the metro map (see p224) and plan your journey in advance as the station names on each platform are not visible from inside the train. It is well worth learning the pronunciation of the station names as the driver will announce which station you are approaching. It is also a good idea to count the number of stops.

2 Purchase a magnetic card from the каска (kassa), the counter situated just inside the metro station. Insert the card into the automatic barrier to gain access to the train platforms. Each time the card is used the details are printed on the back so the number of journeys remaining can be monitored.

3 To find the right platform follow signs headed к станции до станции (k poezdam do stantsiy), which show the stops in each direction from the station you are at. These signs are sometimes colour coded.

Stops in one direction

4 On the platform, consult the signs showing all the stops of the line you are using. Trains always stop at each one. Look at the vertical lists beneath each interchange station. These show which subsequent stations you reach by changing at that point.

Colour of intersecting line Stops on other lines Line

5 Look at the digital board showing the time that has elapsed since a train last left the station. On weekdays another one will usually arrive within one or two minutes.

Current time Minutes and seconds since last train

6 If you change to a different line during your journey, follow the signs marked with either переход (perekhod) or на станцию (na stantsiyu) and the appropriate station name. Once at your destination follow signs for выход (vykhod) to locate the exit.

Travelling by Tram, Trolleybus and Bus

Moscow has extensive bus, trolleybus and tram routes, and some of the most useful ones are identified on the transport map on the inside back cover of this book. Some routes link in with the metro network (see pp222-4), often starting at one metro station and terminating at another. Main avenues are generally served by both buses and trolleybuses. Trams are less useful but, as a sedate form of transport, they are great for sight-seeing. Busy routes can get extremely crowded during the morning and evening rush hours, and traffic is often slow-moving at these times. Moscow's newer, more remote suburbs are well served by these forms of transport. Stops are clearly signed and are at frequent intervals, though tram stops are occasionally further apart.

TRAMS

Although trams remain Moscow's most traditional means of transport, services are now being cut back and some old tracks have been removed altogether. However, they provide a bumpy, entertaining ride for children, and interest and variety for visitors.

The surviving tram services run frequently, especially those operating in the suburbs, linking metro stations and apartment blocks. Tram stops are marked by a transparent sign labelled "Tp" in Cyrillic and usually have a semi-circular shelter with a bench.

Trams have one or two carriages, each with three doors. It was customary to get on through the rear door and leave through the front, but this practice is no longer observed.

Tram route A, which starts at Chistye Prudy metro, is useful for visitors to the city as it passes close to quite a few of Moscow's central sights.

TROLLEYBUSES

Trolleybuses are very useful for travelling around the city centre. Even though they are less comfortable and Muscovites prefer travelling by bus, most of the routes are still packed during rush hours. Stops are marked by a plaque with the Cyrillic letter T.

Trolleybuses are blue, red or yellow. Those with two cars have three working doors and those with a single car have two working doors. As with trams, there is no established etiquette as to which door to use when getting on or off.

Trolleybus Б travels around the Garden Ring and is good for getting to know the city. Trolleybus

BUSES

lines are much greater than in the centre. Bus stops are marked by white and yellow plaques showing the Cyrillic letter А and are the same distance apart as trolleybus stops.

Public buses are yellow, red, or red and white. Bus services in the city centre are limited, and there are none running along Tverskaya ulitsa. However, several bus routes run up Kutuzovskiy prospekt past the Borodino Panorama Museum, the Triumphal Arch and Victory Park (see pp128-9).

TICKETS AND TRAVEL CARDS

One-day travel cards are not available in Moscow, but monthly cards can be bought at metro stations; these cover the metro alone; tram, bus and trolleybus (separately or in any combination); or all four modes of transport. Individual tickets for bus, trolleybus and tram are identical and can be bought in metro stations or at nearby kiosks, or from drivers, but then cost a little more.

They must be inserted into the punching machine on any bus, trolleybus or tram to be valid.

Driving in Moscow

Driving in Moscow can be quite gruelling for the uninitiated. Most driving regulations, and many principles that would be considered common sense elsewhere, are ignored. For instance, although the majority of drivers will stop at red lights, some carry on regardless. Cars travel in disorderly lanes and veer dangerously to avoid pot holes. Drivers tend to be aggressive and inconsiderate about giving way to one another. Road signs mostly follow international conventions but, as all major roads are sign-posted in Russian only, it is well worth drivers familiarizing themselves with Cyrillic place-names in advance.

DRIVING REGULATIONS

Driving regulations in Moscow are complex. GIBDD, Russia's traffic police (see p210), have the right to stop drivers at any time and ask for documents.

They can issue fines on the spot for infringements such as not having a fire extinguisher or first-aid kit and not wearing seat belts. It is compulsory for both drivers and front-seat passengers to wear seat belts, although many people do not. Drivers are not allowed to drink any alcohol at all and fines for drink-driving can be very high. It is illegal to make U-turns on many of Moscow's main streets.

Priority is always given to traffic coming from the right unless a yellow, diamond-shaped sign indicates otherwise.

The buying of driving licences is common in Russia, so visitors should not assume that all road users are qualified and responsible.

PARKING AND PETROL

Parking is expensive in most of central Moscow. There are no meters; instead, drivers pay attendants in grey uniforms on either arriving or leaving. Parking time is by half-hour periods, with no time limit. Fines for parking in restricted areas (marked with the international signs) are high. All petrol is leaded. A98 (super-plus) and A95 (super) are suitable for foreign cars; A92 is for Russian-made cars.

CAR HIRE

There are several well-known companies which operate in Moscow. Hertz and Europcar have offices at Sheremetevo 2 airport and in the city centre. Other car-hire companies in Moscow include National Car Rental, Avis and Rolf. Visitors hiring a car need international insurance and must show an international driving licence and their passport and credit card when collecting it. Some of the larger international hotels also arrange car hire.

Multiple lanes of traffic on Teatralny proezd, one of Moscow's busiest roads

WINTER DRIVING

Most drivers use studded tyres in winter as roads are often icy and covered with snow. Driving in these conditions can be dangerous and is not advisable unless visitors have had experience in other northern climates.

DRIVING OUTSIDE MOSCOW

The roads leading out of Moscow are in reasonable condition, but Kutuzovskiy prospekt is particularly well-maintained because it is used by government officials and the New Russians who own a dacha in this area. It is vital to have a good map because side roads to small villages can easily be missed.

Excursions from Moscow

Arrangements to visit sights outside Moscow (see pp126–67) can be made through either a hotel or a travel agency, or the trip can be made independently by train, bus or car. Most of the places mentioned below are not far from Moscow and can be visited on a day trip. A few, such as Suzdal and Vladimir, take two days. Patriarshiy Dom Tours (see p206) offers a wide range of excursions to the major sights around Moscow. It is advisable to enquire in good time as reservations with them have to be made 48 hours before departure.

USING TRAINS AND BUSES

Suburban trains (prigorodnye poezda) to the nearer sights can be caught at the appropriate mainline station (see p218). They usually depart from a station annexe and are cheap as foreigners pay the same fare as Russians. More distant sights are served by passenger trains (passazhirskie poezda).

Suburban buses (prigorodnye marshruty) to several closer excursion sights leave from Moscow Bus Station at Shchelkovskaya metro station in the northeast of the city. Towns further from Moscow are served by inter-city buses (mezhdugorodnye avtobusy).

An inter-city bus, which can be used to make long-distance trips

ONE-DAY TRIPS

Both Novodevichiy Convent (see pp130–1) and Kolomenskoe (see pp138–9) are south of the city centre, the former close to Sportivnaya metro, the latter to Kolomenskaya metro. Kuskovo (see pp142–3), in eastern Moscow, is also best reached by metro, to Ryazanskiy Prospekt or Vykhino. A short bus ride will then take visitors to the estate.

Arkhangelskoe (see p158), 20 km (12 miles) to the west of the city centre, is served by Tushinskaya metro and then a bus. By car it is on a straight route out along Volokolamskoe shosse or Rublevskoe shosse.

It takes around two hours to travel to the village and battlefield of Borodino (see p158) by train from Belorusskiy station, by bus from Moscow Bus Station or by car, leaving the city on Mozhayskoe shosse.

The Tchaikovsky House-Museum (see p159) is two hours northwest of the city by car on Leningradskoe shosse, by train from Leningradskiy station, or by bus from Moscow Bus Station.

Abramtsevo Estate-Museum (see p160) is situated to the northeast of Moscow just off Yaroslavskoe shosse. Trains leave from Yaroslavskiy station and buses from Moscow Bus Station. The journey takes an hour or so.

The Trinity Monastery of St Sergius (see pp162–5) is also to the northeast along Yaroslavskoe shosse and the journey also takes just over an hour. It is possible to get there by train or by bus from Yaroslavskiy station, and by bus from Moscow Bus Station.

Pereslavl-Zalesskiy (see p160) can be reached by car along Yaroslavskoe shosse, by train from Yaroslavskiy station, or by bus from Moscow Bus Station. The trip takes approximately two hours.

Train arriving at Sergiev Posad for the Trinity Monastery of St Sergius

Inside the carriage of one of Moscow's suburban trains

TWO-DAY TRIPS

Suzdal (see p166), 200 km (124 miles) northeast of Moscow, is reached by leaving the city on Gorkovskoe shosse. Buses to Suzdal leave from Moscow Bus Station and take about four hours.

Vladimir (see pp166–7) is also situated northeast of the city along Gorkovskoe shosse. The 170-km (106-mile) trip can be made by bus from Moscow Bus Station, by train or by car in about three hours.

Yasnaya Polyana (see p167) is 180 km (112 miles) south of Moscow on the Simferopolskoe shosse. Trains run from Kurskiy station and coaches from Moscow Bus Station. Both take almost four hours.

It is worth considering combining a trip to Vladimir and Suzdal; buses run daily between the two. Patriarshiy Dom runs tours to both towns with an overnight stopover, and day trips to Yasnaya Polyana.

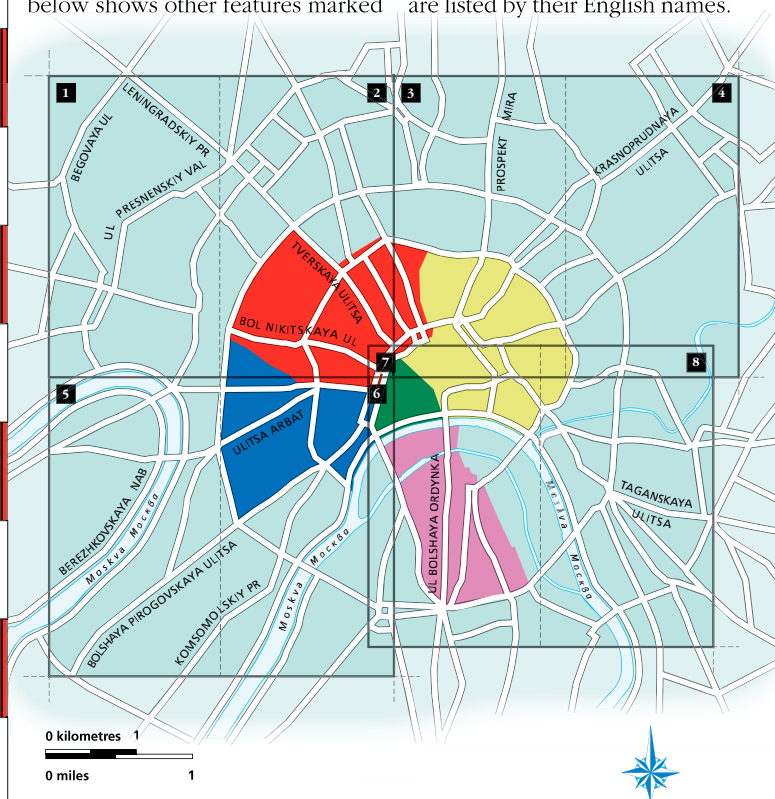

MOSCOW STREET FINDER

The key map below shows the areas of Moscow covered by the Street Finder. The map references given throughout the guide for sights, restaurants, hotels, shops or entertainment venues refer to the maps in this section. All the major sights have been marked so they are easy to locate. The key below shows other features marked

The Street Finder index lists street names in transliteration, followed by Cyrillics (on maps, Cyrillics are only given for major roads). Acknowledgments Dorling Kindersley would like to thank the following people whose contributions and assistance have made the preparation of this book possible.

Main Contributor

Christopher Rice holds a PhD in Russian history from the University of Birmingham. He and his wife Melanie, also a writer, first visited Russia in 1978 and have been returning regularly ever since. They have written numerous travel guides to the city, and to a variety of other destinations including Prague, Berlin, and Istanbul, as well as the Eyewitness Travel Guide to St. Petersburg.

Additional Contributors

Rose Baring studied Russian from the age of 12. She has an MA in Modern History and divided her time between London, Moscow and St. Petersburg for much of the early 1990s. She has written guides to St. Petersburg, Moscow, and other destinations, including the Eyewitness Travel Guide to Istanbul.

Marina Boughton has a BA in Film Studies from the University of Central London. She also studied in Russia and has worked there for a number of years. She is now a correspondent for BBC Radio in Moscow.

Sergey Konstantinovich Romanuik is a graduate of the Moscow State University. Specializing in Economic Geography and the history and cultural life of Moscow, he has written around 200 articles and books about the city.

Phrase Book

In this guide the Russian language has been transliterated into Roman script following a consistent system used by the US Board on Geographic Names. All street and place names, and the names of most people, are transliterated according to this system. For some names, where a well-known English form exists, this has been used – hence, Leo (not Lev) Tolstoy.

GUIDELINES FOR PRONUNCIATION

The Cyrillic alphabet has 33 letters, of which only five (а, к, м, о, т) correspond exactly to their counterparts in English. Russian has two pronunciations (hard and soft) of each of its vowels, and several consonants without an equivalent.

The right-hand column of the alphabet, below, demonstrates how Cyrillic letters are pronounced by comparing them to sounds in English words. However, some letters vary in how they are pronounced according to their position in a word. Important exceptions are also noted below.

On the following pages, the English is given in the left-hand column, with the Russian and its transliteration in the middle column. The right-hand column provides a literal system of pronunciation and indicates the stressed syllable in bold. The exception is in the Menu Decoder section, where the Russian is given in the left-hand column and the English translation in the right-hand column, for ease of use. Because of the existence of genders in Russian, in a few cases both masculine and feminine forms of a phrase are given.

The Cyrillic Alphabet

А а	а	alimony
Б б	б	bed
В в	в	vet
Г г	г	get (see note 1)
Д д	д	debt
Е е	е	yet (see note 2)
Ё ё	ё	yonder
Ж ж	ж	leisure (but a little harder)
З з	з	zither
И и	и	see
Й й	й	boy (see note 3)
К к	к	king
Л л	л	loot
М м	м	match
Н н	н	never
О о	о	rob (see note 4)
П п	п	pea
Р р	р	rat (rolling, as in Italian)
С с	с	stop
Т т	т	toffee
У у	у	boot
Ф ф	ф	fellow
Х х	х	kh (like loch)
Ц ц	ц	lets
Ч ч	ч	chair
Ш ш	ш	shove
Щ щ	щ	fresh sheet (as above but with a slight roll)
Ъ		hard sign (no sound, but see note 5)
Ы ы	ы	lid
Ь		soft sign (no sound, but see note 5)
Э э	э	egg
Ю ю	ю	youth
Я я	я	yak

Notes

- 1) Г Pronounced as v in endings -oro and -ero.
- 2) Е Always pronounced ye at the beginning of a word, but in the middle of a word sometimes less distinctly (more like e).
- 3) Й This letter has no distinct sound of its own. It usually lengthens the preceding vowel.
- 4) О When not stressed it is pronounced like a in across.
- 5) Ъ, ь The hard sign (Ъ) is rare and indicates a very brief pause before the next letter. The soft sign (ь, marked in the pronunciation guide as 'y) softens the preceding consonant and adds a slight y sound: for instance, н' would sound like ny in 'canyon'.

In particular, the names of Russian rulers, such as Peter the Great, are given in their anglicized forms. Throughout the book, transliterated names can be taken as an accurate guide to pronunciation. The Phrase Book also gives a phonetic guide to the pronunciation of words and phrases used in everyday situations, such as when eating out or shopping.
